Secondly, he aduised him concerning Ioaab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreueged, so was it his will that Ioaab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, & suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniuently strooken others withall. Paulus gladio percussit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner & Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: against the other but a meere ieaousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioaab assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiab the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Ioaab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace, and to this apparant & iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembered the ill affection of Ioaab towards Salomon, which Ioaab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioaab had committed against Dauid, of which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest alswat Ioaab the sonne of Seruiab did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abiathar, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abiathar, or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath overthrowne manie a worthy man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

He also gaue order to Salomon to rid himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, he slew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henry the eighth to execute Peck as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Peck vnto him, that while he liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioaab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, & Resin of Damascus, to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioaab the Captaine of the Host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7 yeares, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which he wrote, witness his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus:

Paulinus: Dauid Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alceus, Placcus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in dechachordo Pfalterio ab inferis suscitatur resurgentem; Dauid (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alceus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Pfalter he raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightly & liuely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by David: but whether all the Psalmes were written by David, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors answering the titles of the seuerall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that onely 73. Psalmes were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Naracha, cleuen other on the sonnes of Korath; and cleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalmes which Dauid wrote not, Sext. Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of Dauids singers) Asaph, Ethan, Ezra, Eman, Ezra, Idithun, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes Dauid the sole Author of all the Psalmes, and to doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalmes onely to Dauid, which are ouer-written ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid, to others, this opinion (saith he) Vox Evangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse Dauid in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a patterne to all the kings and princes that succeeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets; Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the seuerall parts of the bookes of Samuel (which intreate chiefly of Dauid), were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, fought for succour from Dauid, and that hee stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time twixt Dauid and the Trojan warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samson Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treasures of Dauid and Salomon.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chron. 27. 14. Nichols, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse & yron paung all weight, which is more than any king in the world posselt besides himselfe; and his sonne to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cart load, & a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or sixe thousand pound sterling to euery cartload, besides three score & seuenteen millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any souerain power to make leuies: but when they went to the wars, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turns gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) by his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part posselt by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great great reuenee, yet needs there must haue beene some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the vtermoost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last chapter of preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melania (or as Vallapandus corrects it, Achana) a citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Vrphie, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iurie. Pindarus, de rebus Salomonis, s. i. thinks that Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and cyteth this testimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest from the Canaanites & Philistines; besides those fruitfull vallies neere Iordan in Trachonitis & Bafan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israhelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Ichonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the townes; that Ezri was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground; Simeï ouer the vineyards, and Sabai ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the olive trees, and Iosab ouer the store of the oyle: also that hee had heard of men that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plaines, ouer his Sheepe, Camels and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and cattell, the ancient Kings euerie where held, both before and after Dauid's time. For we reade of Pharaoh, that hee spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to be rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vezza, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise wee reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cyte Augem and Admetum, or anie other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlkely, but that those captiues which were not employed in husbandrie, were manie of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romanes in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtlesse were great; and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tohu and others) wee may adde the great spoyle which hee found in the cities and countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitacionis; By the law of capitacion, or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sicke of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as foure pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbered by Iosab. Now although this law of capitacion be thought by some verie learned, not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuerthelessse they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlkely to haue put it in practise. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer: a great summe, but holding a verie small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue beene, hauing receiued continual encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned, partly out of the spoyle gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the country receiued benefite of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a faire greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued and one in fise hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoyle of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixteene thousand; but out of the sixteene thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the lesse that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other mettalls found in Ierico, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntarie presents.

Now howeuer the Israhelites were many times oppressed, & troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue bin exceeding great; as containing about one hundred part of all the money and other goods found by the Israhelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Iosab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, & before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in war, to maintaine the house of the Lord: the like wherof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bin made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for hee reuiued yearly reuenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Cities of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Iudra and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syriacs of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmirena, of Ituraa; all of Idumea, Mozab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subiected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after 40 years reigne, and 70. yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauid's Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, inso much as Hircanus (who first of the Chasmanis, or race of Maccabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem; & afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians & other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the

Of the Philistims, whose pride Dauid was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of Dauid's time somewhat heere may be spoken.

They descended of Casim, who, according to Isidor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Espan was surnamed Edom, and Iacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of pettie principalities, namely, Azotus, or Asdod, Gaza or Azzaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech liued at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumaea, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till Dauid's time: perhaps the gouernment was turned into Aristocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named king of Gath, the same to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him we reade of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch backe his fugitiue seruant, what time the seeking of his seruant was the losse of his life. Jeremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and Dauid, and therefore I shal not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with Dauid, the third of the Siluij King of Alba, called Laius Siluius, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italic fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontida, without regall name gouerned Athen during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their gouernment, were not drawn from any inconuenience found in the rule of soueraignty, but in honor of Codrus only. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region between Phocis, & the mountain of Orty, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preferre the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Affyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. yeere of Dauid, and reigned 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Xion the 11. King of the Heraclide, the sonne of Eurythynes in Corinth, and Agis the second of the Heraclide in Lacedaemon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called. After many yeeres after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messeniens, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like fort from the Scelani came the word Slane. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized vpon the country of Ilyria & made it their owne by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slanos, which is in their language glorious. But in after times (that war-mist Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden downe, and made seruants with their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slanes, vntill the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and say, that Achestratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Ensebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

In the tenth yeere of Achestratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus, assisted by the Iones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slaine by the Carians, whose countrie hee vsurped. He was buried (saith Strabo) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next prouince to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) hee enlarged his Dominions vpon the Aeoles, which ioyneth to Ionis: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities of Ephesus and Erythrae by the name of Basilidae in Strabo's own time. Of the expedition of the Iones when they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I haue * spoken already vpon occasion of the returne of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dorics, they expelled the Achaei, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heraclide 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425. foor, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble of 70. foor high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, & all the rest of choyce marble polish, the worke being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnostos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop: to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other Citie posselt by Androclus in Aeolis, was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraea: who liued 740. yeeres before Christ was borne. S. Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke copie certain verbes of this Propheteffe: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Iesus Christus Dei filius, Saluator: Iesus Christi Sonne of God, the Saviour.

About the time that Isab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to gouern in Egypt, the same that was father in law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembered by Ensebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuer Moeander, where Scipio gaue the great ouerthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best Horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minye gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Seruius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumrans of Aeolis, saying, that to the one of these people the gouernment was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the city. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Isocrates.

Ensebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Mecinus the son of Badezor, brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of Dauid, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acaulus liued, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten yeeres. Some writers make it probable, that the Aeolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Orestes, posselt the Citie and Ile of Euboea about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who saith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if he knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars vnto Dauid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauid's reigne ouer Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seauen yeeres in Hebron ouer the house of Iuda. Wherefore it must needs bee that Hiram had reigned about 30. yeeres yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should bee giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII. OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijahs death, and of Salomons wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iedidias, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome betwene Princes very ancient. Whence, wee reade that Dauid did in like sort salute Hannun King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soon after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijahs desiring by Berisbea, that the young maid Abisbag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdom contrary to the will of Dauid whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, & he that fees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-fighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had bene Concubines to a king, might not after bee touched but by a king: whence Achitophel wished Abisag to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death. And this it seemes was the depth of Isobeths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid; I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wiue. And in the words of Saul vpbraiding Jonathan, that hee had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions, as either that hee would learn such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes: yet the kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, & in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authority in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely of Jacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Berisbea and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, thus it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authority to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it now here appears in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgal: that is, they acknowledged & established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, hee rid himselfe also of Iosab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: hee displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because he had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, hee tooke the daughter of Naphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eusebius calls him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; Salomon choseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which we may informe our selues, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the conueying after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impiety: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of countenell, which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which hee had not any warrant either from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone hee iudged the controvercie between the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HEE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dauid, that he called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Isaiah giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth yeer of his reigne, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esiongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggin trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barraza, Acarius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery month by course: hee also vsed 80. thousand Mafons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceived, hee selected out of the Prolesites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke; so as hee paid and employed in all one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were farre more

Only it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batrica, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Prouince, to bee the Tharhis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his own country, and because of some affinity of sound betwene Tharhis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeeres ere they that took ship in the red sea, should return from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages between Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we haue no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might bee long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israclites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not haue been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniences, and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublefome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and the theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Loppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Country, haue laden and vladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largenes greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed vp in the Atlantick Ocean, hindered Salomons ships from passing through the Straits of Gibraltar: for this hee allegeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Medirran sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stood: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden Mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionas sailing to Tharhis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three daies swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran seas, and so through the freights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the Red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Niniue. This conceit he grounds only vpon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2.5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Ionas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it back vnto him, keeping his owne rule, which in this place hee forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor deliuered without cause, nor faimed as pleasure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might be thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sebaes coming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes, from Arabia faelix, & not, as some thinke, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, & Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the Text. But herein Iosaphus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Seba

Nicaules,

Nicaules, the successor (saith hee out of Herodorus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Menecus the founder of Memphis, adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho slew Iosias King of Iuda.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garrisons fourteene thousand Chariots, and twelue thousand horsemen; that hee spent in Court euery day thirty measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stables of horses he had for his chariots & other vses, & for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For the ten thousand stables in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stables or teemes, and in Jeremy teeme ten horses, as Ianius and the Geneuea vnderstand it. He was said to bewilder than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcol, or than Iorda, to which Ianius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrah. For the Geneuea maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosaphus writes them Atham, Aman, Chalcus, and Danai the sonnes of Heman. He spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publike Records of Ciuill causes and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to bee inserted into Gods Booke.

S. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seuen hundred Wiues, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when hee fell adoring, his Wiues turned his heart after other gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damascus, and by Ieroboam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, que ipse non fecit: God in punishing sinners, vseth the sins of others, which he himselfe wrought not.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by coniecture. The most likely way to guesse at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Scauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him in the yeere following. The bringing home of the Ark seemes to haue been in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time hee had sufficient leisure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fixe yeeres, considering that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as hee had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in vse, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies country, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery soldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Astaphoboth the son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Isab after the victory, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre taking vp all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Adadazer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue been the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which hee sent forth Isab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe hee felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie Iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that child which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue been nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when he began to reigne at the deceale of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Abisalon slew his brother Amnon: three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue been one yeeres work. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa the rest, may well seeme to haue been in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmities, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob nere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistims vnderooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age: for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had fixe or seuen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely that manie of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken partie of Isab the sonne of Zeruia.

At this time it might both truly be said by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child: for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with eyther of these two speeches.

Neuertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that hee was but eleuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Author, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps vpon that which is said of Abisalons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstood as yeeres of Dauids reigne. But whereas Rabbi Salomon the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when hee began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of 9. nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his reigne began. To auoide this incommenience, Iosephus allows 80. yeeres of reigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the words of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning he should haue bene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembered in Abisalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which GOD brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodore, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Abisalon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanitie of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled, The wisdom of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Hierome) qui Salomoni inscribitur, Græcam redollet eloquentiam; The stile of the Booke of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, sanoueth of the Græcians eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he consulted in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Cite of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct foretelling of the Passion of Christ in these wordes: 10 Circumueniamus iustum, quoniam insuetus est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, for he is vnplesant to vs, hee is contrary to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the soune of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Cantorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas & Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoueries.

Of Salomons Bookes of Inuocations, and Incantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though (as I conceiue) rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vnertaine report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliasarius, who by the roote in Salomons ring, disposeth diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailtie hath neuer bene read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisdom from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his only seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudæa, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God; and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more libtall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Syriacides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a sould? Thy minde couered the whole earth, and hath filled it with graue and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the flect, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus hee concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to women, and wast ouer come by thy body; thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy 50. folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Here the beginning of Salomons reigne, Achis slays the third of the Hebreides in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soonic after Syluius Alba the fourth of the Siluii, swayed those Kingdomes; Laothenes then gouerning Affyria; Acasius & Archippus the second and third Princes after Dauid, ruling the Athenians.

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Balastus succeeded, and reigned seyntene yeers, after Amercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolius finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reigne of Bozorius.

Isaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac of Shishak (as our English Generall termes him) began to gouern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosichus; Iosephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susichus; Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings, Suacnes; and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reprooueth it as an error in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesoftris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparifon, accounting Sesac another Sesoftris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesoftris I haue spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this hee was reproued, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be scene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesoftris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-moost wheeles next him, which Sesoftris perceiuing, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabillity of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmoost part was as suddenly turned down-ward, and vnder all: which when Sesoftris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesoftris, and that hee could not bee taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

S. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatrie.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty yeeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Egypt, since hee fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arriuall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) bee more assured, if hee desired rather to bee beloued than feared: whereof hee tooke three daies to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that hee was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolue, so had he not the iudgement to discern of counsels; which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that hee had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: hee was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backes of his subjects those burdens which greatly cruell them; but (vaunting falsely of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vnsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared in the successe, those younger aduisers greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subiects. For what the strength of a King left by his people: and what cords or fetters haue cuer lasted long, but those which haue been twisted and forged by loue onely: His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arriued, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? wee haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Israhel. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God; and as all alienate resolute hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now our late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beate to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourescore thousand chosen men, Shimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was staied for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set vpon two Calues of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods which deliuered them out of Egypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Leuites, which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Israhel; for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophetic and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophesie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the Authority of Achia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claued a sunder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandement of God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceed as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith hee) politici vocantur, & propria commodis, presentibus sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituant, causam quam vocant statum in capite tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplexanda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iniustitia honestatis, leges subvertenda, si religio ipsa pessandanda, si denique, omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasque relinquendum censent; cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil adipisci, modo id, quod de re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigare possit Deus: So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their vniuersall end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit; soe went to alleage the ease of state forsooth, as the principall point to bee regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honesty, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, bee it right, bee it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of ragione del stato, did serue as well to vphold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amos 2. 4 the Priest of Bethel, counsaileth the Prophet Amos, not to prophetic at Bethel; For (saith hee) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of this that perswaded the last famous French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceedinge make euen those that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it: and behold the wretched ends that haue euer followed it; whereof Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had and were themselves very great examples.

Cap. 47. § 13.

While Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recouer the Prouinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fiftene Cities of Iudah and Benjamin: not that hee feared Ieroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not only fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to invade Iuda: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Solomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were reuolted, and become enemies to the Iudaens. So as by those two waies (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing, as he thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groues on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his reigne, Sefac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumea, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments, entred Iudaea with twelue thousand Chariots, and threethou thousand Horse, besides Foot-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations: Egyptians, Iudaens, Succæans, and Cusites. The Iudaens were Lybaens, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petrea, and of the desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succæans, according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomee, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about fixe hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doe not thinke that the Succæi, or Succæi were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomee calls Arabes Egyptii, or Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt between the mountaines called Alabasirini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Egypt, and readier to be leuied than those remoued Saueages of the Troglodites.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sefac inuaded Iudaea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adadazer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the soueraigntie of Iudaea, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seemes, rendering vnto Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may bee gathered out of the Word of GOD, where premising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these words: Neverthelesse, they (to wit, the Iudaens) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of Sefac.

After

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelue yeeres, and his losses recieued by Sefac, notwithstanding, he continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemciab and Hidden the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernors for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdasartus, or Abisartus, in Tyre. Dorisshus the sixt of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Enschius (others make him the sixt) and Primianus the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Syluius Alba, Syluius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluii.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdasartus king of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which vsurped the kingdome twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periclades, or Pyrrhiades, began to gouerne Assyria, the 34. king thereof: and not long after Asartus, the son of Baleasartus, recouered the kingdome of Tyre from the Vsurpers.

S. III.

Of the great battaile betweene Ieroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

Abia the sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers kingdome, and his vices. Hee raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which he inuaded Ieroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side fixe hundred thousand; the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abia being now master of the field, recouered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron: Soon after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abia, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the second of Chronicles: he reigned but three yeeres, & then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Ido the Prophet; as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the succesor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring kings; & when he forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals: Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac; For the son Abia was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, & with the same number hee ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fixe hundred thousand; God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleasest him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And Dauid 2. Sam. 12. 10 towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelue torne from his son for his Idolatrie: Rehoboam was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe and his posterity, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sons slaine by the Philistims, and his very bowels tome out of his body by an excoiating flaxe, for murdering his brethren. Abah and Iezabel were slaine, the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sines in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities; howsoever the wife men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

S. IIII.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as prouident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leisure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudaea, and with such a multitude entered the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Iudaeans, Zerah of Athiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand, leuiued out of those two Tribes of Iuda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee overthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoyle both of their Cities and Campes.

* In the former booke. c. 9. s. 13. & c. 10. s. 10. * G.
That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I haue * proued already, and were it but the length betweene Ethiopia and Iudaea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt-terricent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appeare, how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Ethiopi-ans. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, & the cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Iudaeans, in following their victory, as places be- longing to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Belor, which Dauid past ouer when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proueth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, & that Gerar was a frontier town stand- ing on the vttermost South-border of all Iudaea, all parts of Ethiopia five hun- dred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa tooke, as the cattell, camels, and sheepe, where- of he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnkown Ethiopi-ans. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petrea, and the Desert which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thou- sand, as that two Tribes of the twelue, should arme five hundred and fourescore thou- sand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Na- tions should exceede in number; for God spake it of Israel, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly; that hee should beget twelue Prin- ces, &c.

Basba a king of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad king of Syria, of the race of Adadzer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to block him vp, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Basba died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Basba begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reign, but in the 35. yeer of the diuision of Iuda and Israel; for so many yeeres it was from the first of Robo- am, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred & fourescore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily driue away Basba, and defeat him of his purposes; the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousand hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens pri- uate busineses to lye vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the cul- ture of their lands & other trades, might be vnwilling to stirr against the Israelites, choo- sing rather to winke at apparant incontinencie, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the tem- ple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Basba, whose emploiments Ben- hadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Basba. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that king- dome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthali, without resistance, hee spoiled diuers principall Cities thereof, & enforced Basba to quit Rama, & to leaue the issue to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither party, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Iuda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Agesilau the sixth of the Heraclida, and Bacis the fifth king of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacida, Asartus, & Asartimus were kings in Tyre. Asartimus took reuenge on his brother Phellers, for the murder of Israhbail Priest of the goddesse Asarta, whom Saloman in dorage worshipp- ed. Asa & Caps ruled the Latines: Pirithadas & Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Pambas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successor, that reigned fifty sixe yeeres, euen to the 16. of 36. Asa.

S. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of Dauid, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance laid vpon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Is- rael, for the sinne of Saloman, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One son Ierobo- am had among others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamenta- tion at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good son, the vngodly father was soon taken away: a mis- erable creature, so conscions of his vile vnthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreame hatred, yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wis- dome, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeer of two and twenty did run along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Basba, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence: It seemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, & besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to mind their grievous losse of five hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slaine he was by Bascha, whom the Army did willingly accept for king in his stead: Bascha was no sooner proclaimed king, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, & not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Ieroboam had begun. Wherefore he receiued the same sentence from God that had been laid vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. He began to infect Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, destroying all the Land of Neptulim. Foure and twenty yeeres hee reigned, and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his son; who enioyed it, as Nadab the son of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres curreant, perhaps not one complete.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Ieroboam perished; but he sat at home the whilest, feasting & drinking with his Minions, whereby he gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the king at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, & his behauiour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Bascha had found, by doing as Bascha had done. Wherefore he did set vpon Ela in his drunkenesse, and slew him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe king of Israel: and began his reigne with massacring all the house of Bascha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliae into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to haue reigned: accounting as is most likely to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, walking in the way of Ieroboam; & therefore is likely to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the reigne of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Bascha, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not bene ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlike to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. V I.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Iuda, which might haue bene effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient kings, and re-uite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Iuda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken; than to haue recourse vnto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the

the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That therewithin laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betweene Israel & Iuda, so many yeeres following: wherein Asa so faire preuailed, that hee was a great battailer, and recouered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vs-starts, rather than to cast their eyes vpon that Royall house of Dauid, from which the succession of five kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue bene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an adolater, but did worse than all that were before him; which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly king, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the family and friends of Bascha, (Asa his mortall enemy) giues manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more iustly than he haue expected the friendship of Iuda in that quarrel. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnes in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the son of Ieroboam, who followed the wars in person, as a man of spirit & courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to haue a king that should not oppresse them; not to haue no king at all. And therefore when the arrogant follie of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately chioose Ieroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty vnto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceiued. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towes, & in the institution of his new devised idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so far as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his son, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtserie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatiues of a king, that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is cleerly apparant, that the whole army of all Israel ioined with Bascha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams house.

Now the reigne of Bascha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his son, who likewise appears an vnprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Bascha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happely he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And surely hee that shall take pains to look into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the kings of Israel & Iuda, in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued to auerfe from the line of Dauid; so as to thinke all aduersitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Isab and Shimei was indeebd by them deferred; yet in that they suffered it without forme of iudgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the kings lealousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary iustice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) hee would haue slaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong, hauing not offered anie.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, & vpon sundry of his greatest men; as also Iosab did so put to death Zachariah the son of Iehiada, who had made him king, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till hee replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sinne, wherewith he made Iuda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for amirance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of Elisba the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not paine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, thought God it could not.

The murder of the Prophet is continually ascribed to Sezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the king her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, & laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Iuda (such as are registred) proue them to vie a more absolute manner of command, than the kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the kingdom, to the captiuitie of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all that Royall seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the suddennesse and vniformity testifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes: vnlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seuen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whercon she had seized. On the other side, such of the kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seuen of the twenty) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so far from embrouing their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbear to reuenge the death of their kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good successe of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two kings, being thoroughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shalum, who traitroufully got and vnrped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seuen remain, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of king Edward and king Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howsoeuer all that the Law calls treason, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most preuailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoeuer wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural Soueraignes, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man impute vnto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly, ascribe to a recurrent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarches need not to feare any cubing of their absolutenes by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people; who will be sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: euery Sheriffe and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebel, how mighty foucer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the kings. Vpon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept vniually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue bene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authority of a Queene-mother, haue destroyed all the seed of Dauid, and vnrped the Kingdom very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set vp Iosab their lawfull King, wherunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Dauids, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or aduision, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did neuer seek to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Ase, admitted a seventh of a new family, rather than they would confusethemselues, with those of Iuda and Benjamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So Ase hauing seen the death of 7. kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of Omri, who was the eighth King ouer the ten Tribes.

§. VII.

Of Iehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Iehosaphat, who succeeded Ase, was a Prince religious and happy; hee destroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatry, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one he had sluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand and foure hundred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehohanan of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that he had, besides these, in Benjamin of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada, two hundred thousand, and vnder the commandement of Iehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which so numbered together, make eleuen hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King besides his garisons.

That Iuda & Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Iosab in Dauids time found five hundred thousand: Rebeboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Ase five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, & they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, ly, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Iehosaphat that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the West of Jordan; and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would haue feared even the army of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field a hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand vnder Ahab, and the 200. and fourecore thousand vnder Iehosaphat, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Iehosabad: for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was vnder the other kings formerly named. Again, as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Iehosaphats Leaders had vnder him.

This mighty Prince notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he ioynd in friendship with Ahab king of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iehosaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his son Ioram to marry Atalia, this Ahab's daughter.

Ahab perswaded Iehosaphat to assist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victory. But Iehosaphat beleued nothing at all in those diuiners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Ahab made answer that hee had one called Michaiab, but he hated that Prophet, because hee alwayes foretold of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet Michaiab was sent for to the king; but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise victory vnto them as they did. But Michaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the kings, which was, that God asked who should perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you, that spake, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kinde did the deuill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Ahab to his destruction. And as Martyr vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, & are vied as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to saue & deliuer from destruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the euill that hee punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are euerie where visible. There are spirits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discouered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Ahab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be refused and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiab, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Neuertheless Ahab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, ioynd with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idumians means to invade Iudea: who passe Jordan & encamp at Engaddi; & when Iehosaphat gathered his army, the prophet Iahaziel foretold him of the victory, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: & so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumians, & quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon & Moab set vpon the Idumians, & brake them vtterly; which done, they also invaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriuing took the spoile of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold & promised misied by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Iehosaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous king, did notwithstanding ioyne with Ochazias, the son of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir: hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliasar the Prophet foretold him, his ships perished, & were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was ouerthrowne.

Yet hee taked part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which kings of Iuda & Israel the Edomites ioyne their forces, not forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their army.

The Moabites, subiects to Dauid & Salomon, forsaking the kings of Iuda; gaue themselves for vassals to Ieroboam, & so they continued to his successours till the death of Achab: but Iehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this war both to be auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Israel, as also because they had lately ioynd themselves with the Syrians against Iehosaphat, & thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Iuda & now Israel.

Both kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon & Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Iehosaphat, it is not certaine; for in the 2. of Chron. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram the son of Iehosaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab & Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, & to ioyne themselves with the army of Iuda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Iehosaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a king, till Iehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeer, or whether the Idumians hauing a purpose to rebel, mislead the army of Iuda & Israel, with intent to infeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Cassius & M. Antoninus did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood vtterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches so when into the water spring, by which not only Iehosaphat and his army, but Iehoram king of Israel an Idolator was relieved: the great mercy & goodnes of God hauing euer been prone to saue the euill for the good, whereas he neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the king of Edom, for sacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Iehoram among the kings of Israel. Iehosaphat reigned 25. yeeres and died; hee was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set ouer his graue is yet to be seen, saith Brocard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the son of Hanani.

There liued with Iehosaphat, Ophraemes in Assyria, Capetus & Tiberinus kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the riuer Tiber (formerly Albulas) tooke name.

In Iehosaphats time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelus or Agelamus in Corinth; and Archilam of the same race, of the Heraclidæ the seuenth in Lacedæmon; Baleorus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Iehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat and Ahazia.

That Iehoram was made king sundry times.

Iehoram the son of Iehosaphat king of Iuda began to reigne at thirty two yeeres of age, and liued vntill he was forty yeeres old, being eight yeeres a king: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is said to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Iehoram king in his stead, as Ahab did his son Ahazia.

This appears by the seuerall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehoram kings of Israel and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldest son of Ahab. For Ahazia is

saied to haue begun his reigne, in the seventeenth yeere of Iehosaphat. Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah succeeded him in the second yeere of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat king of Juda; that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Juda was designed king by his father; it being (as we finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of Iehosaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, nor communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth yeere of Iehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the old king took vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Iehosaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Ioram king of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other kings of Juda & Israel, who did not alwaies reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seem at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mouing Iehosaphat either to assume vnto him his son as partner in the kingdome, whilst hee was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once in the 17. of his reigne vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at leastwise to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or fve yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approue.

We are therefore to consider, that this king Iehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that euer entred into any streight league with the kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vaine, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive & defensiu betweene Israel and Juda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious king, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountaine of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdoms, against the vncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparrant benefit, being so inestimable a iewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri and sister of Ahab king of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was son and heire apparrant to the king of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Iesabel her brothers wife, that she durst vndertake, & could thoroughly performe a great deale more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda & Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victory should haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldom come triuinc by matchng with Idolators, but rather sene the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed, as king, his son Ahaziah; not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine quents of war (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micheas for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

§. I. Pro

§. I. I.

Probable coniectures of the motives inducing the old King Iehosaphat to change his purpose of ten, in making his sonne Iehoram King.

Any arguments do very strongly proue Iehoram to haue been wholly ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Ahab. That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring a liue priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and ynnworthy persons in comparison of him, & of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women & meere subiects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Ben-hadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparrant to the Crown, whereof already he had in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the yongue man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his yonger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly son. For the good king was faine to make his progresse round about the Land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda City by City. This had beene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, & the course of Iustice bene perverted, by the power of such as had borne authority. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges, and by his commission giuen to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, & to the Steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouer-seers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the son of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertain. For Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne; though afterward this Iehoram of Juda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expositors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set downe, yet we may not thinke, that motives therto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondency with Iehosaphat that his father had done, & made vse of it. He drew the Iudean into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the yongue Prince of Juda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had bene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprise against Moab did not bee long so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth, yet the daily negotiations between the two kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the yongue sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for feare of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Iehoram himselfe might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vsuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect & senile in time of aduersity, as insolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their father to enable them, not onely with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other kings doubtlesse had vied vnto their yongue sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might haue bene, by vnwonted means, against vnwonted perils.

§. I. I. The

S. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwise determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him vnto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of a king their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, & so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish kingdom against them; so that the apparant likelihood of their final ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoeuer it was, they were all taken and slaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their liues, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Iehoram was depofed from his Gouvernment; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things, derogatory to their yong Master; which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then king, who durst say the contrary?

After this Iehoram took vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that about all other sinnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to haue set vp Idolgry on by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing hitherto, since Dauid's time, bene gouerned by a Vice-Roy, did now make vnto themselves a king. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flee into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in proceesse of time should breake the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraigne wars, the Iewes by sundry Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Iewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, & reigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Iuda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar king, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin & of Dan farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Iuda; and therefore so vnlike-ly it was to haue maintained it selfe in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape; from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue bene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelitish held such good intelligence at that time with Iuda, that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely bene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, mouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites, who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely som allowance to countenance it by the king, but compulsiue authority to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which, being deuout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the then reuolued Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bin without it, wherewith they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembered, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his kingdom, the good old king appointing now Gouvernours, and giuing them especial charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these words, The Leuites shall bee Officers in Ierusalem, Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall bee with the good. By these phrases it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his son, whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that hee meant to be euen with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the land had done, his heauie indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouerwhelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might well in one moneth haue cast into it with shouels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seemes that of those great numbers which his Father could haue leued, there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to bee feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

S. IV.

Of the miseries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

Hese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecy in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatened both his people, his children, his viuiues, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and euill kings; but were faine to denounce Gods Iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to haue been sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, euen in the daies of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophesie in writing behind him, or that (as some coniecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be beleued than the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verbe that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophesie was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Iuda, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues; all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bin then as they are now, a naked people, all horfemen, and ill appointed; their countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoyle in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must bee considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far remoued from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers, but vnablen to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue been, that spoyled Iuda in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrey was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuell Arts whereby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are these bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one halfe, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherin were inrolled three hundred and eighty thousand fighting men) had bene enough to haue driuen away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people bene vnablen to deale with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes icalousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Country, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sacke the City, or spoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Ierusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore hauing done what spoyles they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahaziah, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely Iehoiada excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Ahaziah, following within two yeeres after this inuasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, finiting him with a grievous disease, in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcas. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had bene his Fathers cuill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entering of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatness, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her sonne such Counsellors of the house of Abab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnreasonable to make much ado about a thing of nothing, and offered the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be laid vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, hauing made greedy vse of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose cuill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fel out indeed in a busie time, when his friend & cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could haue had no better leasure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when hee was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craued the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture, would guide mee by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his comandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth vnto them. For in such kind of vnhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

S. V.

Of the reigne of Ahaziah, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Ohaziah, or Ahaziah, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his reigne ouer Juda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram the son of Abab King of Israel, and reigned but one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Tornicellus, allcaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome; Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twenty yeeres old in the beginning of his Kingdome; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe giue him two yeeres more. Like enough he is to haue bene yongue: for he was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile, by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise vpheld the league made with the house of Abab. Hee was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. Hee accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded.

The Towne being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram king of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahaziah returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part, when he did make a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay fore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certaine it is, that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Abab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue been accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly bee needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

S. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Iehu.

IHe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him king ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecie of Eliz against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know the errand, which Iehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouerheard all the talke or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Eliz was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who lūd vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but vsed the first heat of their affections who ioyued with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not long before, flowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the result might be carried to Iezabel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemed that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Mahab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seauenty Princes of the blood royall there were, that lived in Samaria; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Iuda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of success, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the Prophecie of Eliz might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the God, wherein to great a friend as the King of Iuda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the middle of this securitie, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Mahab, Edom, and other rebels & enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already achieved, and the Queene-Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was requiued by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the king to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. This dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, bee discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the king that was loth to discouer any weakness, caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia king of Iuda in his company, company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had become more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Nabor. Iehoram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that tlying out vpon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, & threw his carcasse into that field, which purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the blood of the vniust possessor. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when the least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitor; or at least to utter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches the Stium, with which the business of her eies, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, he opened her window, & looking out vpon him, began to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side; and soone found them ready to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own seruants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, vvho contumeliously did hale and thrust her, vvhiilst her insulting enemy sat on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body vnder foot. Her dead carcasse that was left without the vvalls, was deuoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murder, and oppression, vvith slow, but sure painment, and full interest.

Ahazia king of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the vvay vvhere he lurked, & receiuing his deadly vvound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (vvhich he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, vvhere he was entred vvith his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

How Ahaziah perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Iehu.

IHe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizem the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him king ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecie of Elizem against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand, that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Nabor. Iehoram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that tyeing out vpon the tread of his fellow king, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, & threw his carcasse into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the blood of the vniust possessor. Neither did Ahaziah escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when the least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traiour; or at least to utter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches the stium, with which she businized her eies, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, & looking out vpon him, began to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in mere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side; and soone found them ready to offer their seruices, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men, of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had beene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own seruants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemy sat on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body vnder foot. Her dead carcasse that was left without the walls, was deuoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murder, and oppression, with slow, but sure painment, and full interest.

Ahaziah king of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked, & receiuing his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (vvhich he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where he was entred with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Sonne he was that succceded her.

S. I.

Of Athalia her usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

After the death of Ahazia, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedegree of Iouda, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyled of her sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her self, and reigne as Queen, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, & made Counsellors vnto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, & ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely, & as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, & many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearful to stir, whatsoeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is feldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the comoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royal blood, all of them in a manner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistines, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faile likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained only in his Family, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to chooseth a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduerture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions he laid vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not only his successour, but also the reuertioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer be subiect to any rising, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his own posteritie could not retain it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the ialous Tyrant thinke, that the onely way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to vphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might she do it in her sonnes. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgat her self so far in her vicked policie, that she lost all opportunitie which the weaknesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring vnto her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faime some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order der for her affaires before-hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the sudden death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was young and vnable to resist. We plainly finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long iourney, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could bee growne to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Iezabels house would onely haue beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing wherewith one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath beene already in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entering into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than hee: Dauid purchased the kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might alien the remainder at his pleasure, or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to bee answered with the words which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Iasab: Behold, the Kings sonne must reigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of Dauid. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoeuer it might be, to the Crown of Iuda; yet it is most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it fixe whole yceres, and a part of the seauenth, in good seeming securitie.

S. II.

How Iehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

In all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason hee was likely to desire, being an enimie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein hee was so far ouercharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Ahab there were scuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes hee drew them altogether into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeale to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ierobasm, no king of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should bee allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was in appearance quite rooted vp, and the Crown of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannicall he had received his kingdom by the vnexpected grace grace of God; and farther in regard of his zeale; expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel; hee was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the kingdome should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to peece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. Hee had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many fouler they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him king, if God, whom (to retaine them) hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Acha drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael king of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the propheticke of Elihu, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with childre. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable misery vpon all the Land. For the furie of *Hazael*s victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one invasion; but hee smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Iordan. Norwithstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those daies the Lord began to loose Israel), but rather it is likely, that they benoied the noble House of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease & pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, ouerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide; and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wisdom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

S. III. Of Athaliahs Government.

THESE calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that shee held some correspondence with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father king Asa, who had done the like. And some probability that the did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon Baalim. Such a sacrifice, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompes might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the deuotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, how fouler the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Leui must needs haue been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very few, and small; and the store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbery. Yet they vp-held in all this misery the seruice of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those daies wherein their entertainment was farre better.

S. IV. Of the preservation of Ioas.

Ehiada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulnes it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some flouery sort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehosabab, who was daughter of king Iehoram, & sister to Athalia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whose pietie makes it seeme that Athalia was not her mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted her to bee such as she was. By her care, Ioas the yongue Prince that reigned soone after, was conueighed out of the newbry, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this yongue childe was not hunted out, when his body was missing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoyded that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Ioas was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to be cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him sucke, who foolishly doubting that she her selfe should haue been slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily come such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will so lose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

S. V. whose sonne Ioas was.

†. I. whether Ioas may be thought likely to haue been the son of Athalia.

NOW concerning this Ioas, whose sonne hee was, it is a thing of much difficultie to asseme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of Ahazia; seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that hee was his Successour, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that thinke him to haue bene, or not, the naturall sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Ioas was not properly called his Son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyranny exercised by her husband at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this ease terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had been heire to the Crowne; for she that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie she might haue done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needfull, that it should be so vnnatural, as to destroy the childe of her owne son, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the loue of Grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessity vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requirith it; yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

That Ioas did not descend from Nathan.

BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to show how it might haue otherwise bin) the pedigree of this Ioas is, by them which think him not the sonne of Ahaziah, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan so the sonne of Dauid, there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origene, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he reuoked it, as was meete; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of Dauid, by Bathsua the daughter of Amme, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioas, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue been the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, & Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for we read of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsbeha did beare vnto Dauid, wherof the one begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that the rest must needs haue beene the children of Vria, and are thought to haue beene Dauid's only by adoption. Wherefore if Ioas had not beene the son of Ahaziah, then must that pedigree haue beene false, wherein S. Matthew deriue him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had only beene of his line by courtesie of Philo, and forme of Law, as any other might haue been. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioas was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Anninus his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Anninus can make Authors to speake what he list.

†. III.

That Ioas may probably be thought to haue been the sonne of Ichoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, methinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, wherof the one telling the wickednesse of Ichoram the son of Iehosaphat King of Iuda, for which he and his children perished, cleareth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise hee would giue him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Ichoram, there was not a sonne left him, save Iehoahaz the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Ichoram vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians vpon the children of Ichoram, one of the seed of Dauid escaped; why may it not bee thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserved: for had all the race of Salomon been rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like though it is that some remembrance more particular would haue bene extant, of an euent so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparant by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoahaz, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legall issue remaining of Dauid, was kept alieue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Ioas, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Ichoram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily vnderstood, why the preservation of Dauid's line, by Gods especiall mercy, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Athalia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining alieue, which afterwards were all slain by Iehoiachin; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Ichoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehoiachin, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Ichoram and all his children, only Iehoahaz his yongest son was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirme to be the same with Ioas, which is called the son of Ahaziah, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue bene. For it was the yongest sonne of Ichoram in whom the race was preferred; which could not in any likelihood be Ahaziah, seeing that hee was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne; and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more vnikely, either that Ichoram should haue begotten many children before hee was eighteene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, hee should vpon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfuitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue bene true, if this were true that Ahaziah was the same Iehoahaz, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, & those other doubts arising from the causelesse cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ioas, are easily cleared, if Ioas and Iehoahaz were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if we vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue been a yeere old at the death of Ichoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall son of Ichoram, though called the son of Ahaziah, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahaz, that soundeth much more neerer to Ioas, than to Ahaziah, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it bee so that Ahaziah himselfe bee also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoahaz; in which manner Ioas might also haue had severall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibility, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leasure to consider of this point.

†. IV.

Vpon what reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Ioas, if he were her owne grandchilde.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions ons of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some vnnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chaste) had inited the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraid by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not unlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that shee had sonnes of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crown vpon her own children, shee did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Iehoi, if he were his grand-mother, yet shee might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might draw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for shee made him spend all his time in idle iourneys, to no other apparant end, than that shee might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutor esse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuises, then was Athalia faine to go roundly to worke, and doe as shee did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) shee were onely stepdame to Iehoi, we need not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

Hus much concerning the person of Iehoi, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diuersitie between it and others, the lesse me thinkes I need to suspect mine owne presumption, as defending blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of coniecture. For all Historie doe giue vs information of humane counsailes & euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only at randome, and many times fallibly. This we often finde in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vnder-takings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Ieremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howfouer the written Law of God was known vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof, were verie terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their wils, that they would not by any means be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to doe: For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befall them, since they left off that seruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out, there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerbed by vaine additions.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel & Iuda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that haue beene written by the most sufficient of merely humane authors: it setteth downe expressely the true, and first causes of all that happened, not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his family, to the securitie of Iehoram in Izrael; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not vary, this Storie, by many great examples, giues most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians doe borrow some of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which doe for them first on foot. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed, for to take out of Luce euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Adrubal in Italy, sitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historically, nor Poetically) to search into the particular humours of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affection; or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives or impediments of euery businesse; and to figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howfouer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable; and Princes, howfouer their intents be seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which pierce both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill milts, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, manie times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begat, are conuerted to another vfe. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well bee excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectually, than many that comes farre greater. So comes it manie times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or townes, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discovered, hauing saluted vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howfouer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queen Mithra, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before hee had receiued any injury; & when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for all leading the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldly asseme, hauing, I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witness that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Friar, comming to visit him in his Popedome, as hauing long before in his meaner citate, been his familiar friend. This poore Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to vfe his old liberty of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politician, to attaine vnto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the Conelinge, and your vnappetness thereto, the more I needes must wonder. To Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seen by what follie this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this bee referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly; than right reason either needes or can. But if wee lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

V

Qui

Qui terram inersum, qui mare temperat Ventosum, & urbes, regnaq; tristitia Diuosq; mortalesq; turmas, Imperio regit vnus aquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the windeswolne streames,
The ciuill Cities and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen, and the mortall band,
Alone doth governe by his iust command.

Then shall we finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertainty nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things deposeeth to his owne honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly governe all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soule, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they haue only this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happines, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoever; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skin of such as walke in this blessed way, do commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, & make them with themselves at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know; as the means to attaine vnto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captivity: wee may well beleue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the buisnesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the lesse true, though they might haue beene omitted, as the lesse materiaall: but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forbore to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the buisnesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleue that any man of iudgement will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faile, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beleefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vsed when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historiographer.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

When Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda; and had found neither any foreine enemy, nor domestically aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the yongue Prince began to bee such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very vnfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to haue beene indued with the stomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Country, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe some of the Captaines, in whose fidelity he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Councellant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first only that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the buisnesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of David, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, & likely to succeede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associats of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty & seruicable hands as would suffice to manage the buisnesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noyse, made vp such a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard: and that was enough, for if the Tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were belowered in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed to defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard vnto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilest yet it may be prevented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of ineuitable mischief.

All Ierusalem was full of the runnour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common ioy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing & beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noyse of folkes in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, shee meant to vse her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that she thought it some especiall solemnitie vsed in the Diuine seruice, vvhich caused this much adoe; and herof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

Many things argue that she little thought vpon her owne Tragedy; although Iosaphus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked, and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cryed Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene mere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new Kings, calling a childe of seuen yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreame degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had she vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet vce neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie successe, through her indifferetion, than otherwise could haue beene expected; so that at his appointment, shee was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood, saue her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Iezabel.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throate of danger, gaping vpon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, shee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a sutable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse and a Murtheresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: so that each of them suruiuing her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the spot slaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses, Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel the more indignitie, and shame of bodie. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robbet. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazeael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as anie part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; she had sons liuing after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as necerely, and beene registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue faued these vngacious Impes, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that euerie man should die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors and aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoyle of it; likely it is, that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, for the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may bee thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, & fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps) following Hazeael in his warres against Iehu absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Ioas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of Ioas his doings, whilst Ichoiada the Priest liued.

By the death of Athalia, the whole Countie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein Ioas, a childe of seuen yeeres old or there-about, began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, he liued vnder the protection of that honourable man Ichoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preferred the Kings life, & restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Ichoiada two wiues, and began Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Leuites were more slacke than he, but euen Ichoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver, and with all other Vntiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

S. II.

The death of Ichoiada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Ichoiada the Priest: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeers, dyed before his Countrie could haue spared him. He was buried among the kings of Iuda, as he well deserued, hauing preserued the race of them, & restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funerall seems to haue bin giuen to him, at the motion of the people, it being said, They buried him in the Citie of Dauid. As for the king himselfe, who ¹⁰ did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Ichoiada, when the Princes of Iuda began to flatter their king, he soone forgat, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthy man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea & God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrey, in fifteene or sixteene yeeres; that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The king himselfe, when once ²⁰ he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest prooffe of his being now king in dedde, that he regarded no longer the lowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeale was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor vpon the stage, he had striuen to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

S. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Iuda in the dayes of Ioas.

BVt God, from whom he was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael king of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Town of the Philistims, addrest himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did inuite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the kings of Iuda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to ⁴⁰ succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreame misery, to the fury of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Ierusalem and his owne kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the ⁵⁰ rooting out of Iehu his posterity, who, like a bloudy Traytor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Ahab, to which hee was a subiect. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoeuer it were, we finde it plainly, that Ioas was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this, for

for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappy treasure, which belonging to the liuing God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth yeere of Ioas, which was the fiftieth of Iehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere he died, leauing all that hee had vnto his Sonne Behadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael, is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by ¹⁰ them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly proue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Ioas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the king of Aram then reigning (who may seem to haue then been the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the king of Iuda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie. 2. Chron. 24. 24.

Now, concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forsake him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Ichoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Ichoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Book of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Ioas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will & pleasure; neither was he more vniust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iosias that godly king, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God there- ³⁰ with, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoada; soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learely collect) in the sixe, or thirtie seuenth yeere of this Ioas his reign, the king falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

And indeed we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwaies tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen and strict account; permitting vsually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either ⁴⁰ delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he deale with many; and so it appears that he deale with Ioas. For this unhappy man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew lo forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strouen to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

S. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Ioas.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Ichoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloued in his lifetime, and reuerenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honestie, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at

at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affliction which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefites, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such; as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of Ioas, yea though he had bin otherwise a man of very small make, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Saniour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heyre, come let vs kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing be like that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great fouler that mans deserting were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised vpon Naboth, or whether surprising him by any close treachery; I doe neither reade, nor can coniecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique iudgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the kings commandement, by which hee suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the kings of Iuda.

§. V.

How Ioas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

This odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, & his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well-describ'd curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, & to call for vengeance from thence; which fell downe swiftly, & heauily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his reign; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himself beginning to lue how he lifted without controulment. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrey, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Ioas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice against his best friend, is in my iudgement, proofe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might haue leaued (as his son after him did muste) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when hee might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Routers, hee tooke a very great Armie, so that wife men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrey, and expose himselfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was mere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wife men thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he might be about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Ioas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amercement happening among the fouldiers, or by what fouler means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Iuda receiued a notable ouerthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebelle to the King of kings. As for Ioas himselfe (as Abulenfis and others expound expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an exceeive ranfome.

And (surely) all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this coniecture. For the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Ioas ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-faououredly. Now at that time Ioas the sonne of Iehophaz reigned ouer Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrey; the other inferiori euery way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as afterward followed, might haue giuen to the king of Iuda good cause to be bold, and plucke vp his spirits; which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian king in hope; that by terrifying him with some shew of Warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe hereof, already related, & the (perhaps as vnexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following Warres against the king of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakenesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the kingdome of Iuda, after more than forty yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of Enemies; and the kingdome of Israel, hauing so been trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Footmen were left; pretailed against his Sonne, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euerie where found, and therefore I will not insit vpon this; though indeede wee should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heauenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, & saw that they were notable, being so few, to take any possession of the Countrey, they departed out of Iuda loaden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so wel. The king of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitess, & of a Moabitess, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) he should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or what fouler else it were that animated them to murder their king: the Scripture tels vs plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same appears to haue bene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazias, the sonne and successor of Ioas, durst not punish them, till his kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was iudged vnworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the king, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes lining in the time of Ioas: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

Here liued with Ioas, Mezades & Diogenes in Athens; Eudemus, and Aristomides in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Aladins, were kings of the Albans in Italy. Orraxares, commonly called Anacyn-daraxes, the thirty seuenth king succeeding vnto Ophrasanes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Ioas, which lasted forty two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the reigne of Punonim in Tyre, and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido, the building of which City is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres yonger than Rome, others about 400. yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeer of Hiram king of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Agamemnon. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and ferue not very well to make cleer the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeeres, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion, we may well enough beleue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Iuss, was a hundred forty and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that wee might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Anthonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Aut. Ep. 117.

*Ille ego sum Dido vulsu quam conspicis hospes, Asimulata mediis pulchraq; mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec incestus lata cupidinisibus;
(Namq; nec Aeneas vidit me Troius unquam
Nec Lybiam aduenit, clausibus Iliacis.
Sed furis fugiens, atq; arma procaus Iarbae,
Seruauit, fatcor, morte pudicitiam;
Pellorq; transiit, castos quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut leso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse iuuat: vixi, sine vulnere fame,
Vita virum, pestis manibus oppeti.
Inuida cur in me stimulaſti Musa Maronem, Fingeret ut nostra damna pudicitia?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui surta Deum concubituſq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisq; deos asimulant vitijs.*

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'ie.
Like this I was, but had not such a soule,
As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Aeneas neuer with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or iea'lousie;
I did with weapon chaste, to saue my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end: but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd by husband's death, liu'd with renowne.
Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers betwene Historians, not those Which to the world lyes thefts and vice expose.
Poets are liers, and for verses fake
Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many Histories: but in particular we finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed, and prosecuted in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne. Of Ioas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Mazius, the son of Iosb, being twenty five yeeres old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoever it had bene severely despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by pronition of good Princes, yea & of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himselfe vnto it. And at that present time the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late king from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the king himselfe, euen whilst that execrable murder, committed by the king vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serue as a notable example of Gods iustice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traytors that had slain king Iuss, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the kings of Iuda. Neuerthelesse, after this; when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the king, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods iudgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue: which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their king did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary iustice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, & so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteen yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commodity of a long peace, so Iuss the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had bene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoash. But as Gods benefites to Iehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this politike Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoash from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subiects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the fauour of God, which had bene infinitely more wroth, I doe not finde, nor beleue that they fought: that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoa-haz, wea-red and broken with long aduersity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; wee finde that in the thirtie seventh yeere of Ioas, King of Iuda, Ioas the sonne of Iehoa-haz began to reigne ouer Israel in *Samar*a; which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appears that this yongue Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriner. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Ioas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, shew me the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Hories and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ishab king of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead childe vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcass, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vnu-derped, and weakened the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to *Samar*a.

§. VIII.

Of Amazias his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by Ioas.

HE happy successe which Ioas had found in his war against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazias a desire of vnder-taking some expedition, wherin himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand feruicible men for the Wars; & his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, & the hire of many more. Cause of war he had very nift against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fifty yeeres beene vnuclained, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timoroufnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisdome to increase his forces, with souldiers waied out of Israel, whence he lured for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iehaphis diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse before he had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill successe, if he strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not loue; because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in all part this dis-mission as an high disgrace, which to reuenge; they fell vpon a piece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazias with his owne forces, knowing that God would be assistant to their iourney, entered courageously into the Edomites Country; ouer whom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which he drew from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victory did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the Crowne of Iuda, which might be the cause of that fecerity, which was vied to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends & kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount

Seir,

Seir, Amazias took as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garisons there, whereby he might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole country. Howsoeuer it were, he got both honour by the iourney, and gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contraritely know not by what strange witchcraft, so befottered this vnworthy King Amazias, that he set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them.

2 Chron. 25. 14.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and threatning answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these idols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the kings fancie; me thinks, he should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himself to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to much more vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, & sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel, which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau hauing broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had fore-told, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazias did hope to reconquer all the Countrey of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him.

2 Chron. 25. 11.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honor of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vie their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly scene, that they, who entering into battell, are careful to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledge of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how hee got such a ground of aduantage; another, how hee gaue checke to such a battalion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Canon; euery one struing to magnifie himself, whilest all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is,
I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose more wisdome and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man aduanceth itselfe with confidence of acceptance, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hostes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazias (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: hee had shewed himselfe a better man of war than any king of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour hee saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, vvhoo had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; hee hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was dissembler with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiety following) Iehaphis doth testifie;

Iof. Ant. 8. 9. c. 10.

testifie;

testifie, saying, That he despised God, and that being putt vp with his good successe, of which neuerthelesse he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Ioas King of Israel to become his subiect, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the iniury done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the iourney against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or fourteene yeeres. Neuerthelesse it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subiects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazias desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Ioas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Ioas returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazias in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stust perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might bee made (according to that which Iosephus hath written) between a king of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophacles reported of Aiax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but hee would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell vpon disgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazias did vtter such wordes, I doe not finde: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such wordes, he was rewarded with successe according. The very first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when he had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight vvith the Edomites, a weakie people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ioas, who from 30 so poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp in a long victorious warre. But as Amazias discouered much want of iudgement, in vnder-taking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, he behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to bee good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than lend a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrary side, hauing bene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the king of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrey, but presented himselfe with an Army in Iuda, ready to bid battell to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourney. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare vvhich an inuasion beates into people, not inured in the like) hauing decoured in their greedy hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iourney of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their king that had stomach enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Dauid to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole-hardinesse might easily haue bene foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischief that fell vpon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leauing their king to shift for himselfe; which he did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Army which led, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might bee opened to let him in and his Army; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captiue, with these dreadful wordes, that he durst do no other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Neuchadnezzar, was vterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to save it, vsed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ioas, with vvhich honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) he could not rest contented, but, the more to despise Amazias and his people, he caused 400 cubits of the wall to be thrown downe, and entred the citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the king before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, he dismissed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

Adismissal of the reasons hindering Ioas from uniting Iuda to the Crowne of Israel, when hee had won Ierusalem, and held Amazias prisoner. The end of Ioas his Reigne.

It were iustly maruell how it came to passe, that Ioas, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, & his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when he might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobility, being the sonne and gran-child of Kings, together vvith the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of government, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, vvhen a long succession of vvicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that vvould haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I neede not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie vvhich Peka the son of Romelia got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so vvell exercised, as Ioas had bene; in recourcing his own, and vniouing from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, vvhich, of all others, had been most materiall, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their king, it is plainly seene, that entering Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ioas vvvas vnable to concoct his own prosperitie. For, the opening of the gates had bene enough to haue let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreaty (especially hauing sure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, vvhen they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had bene before. The faire marke which this opportunitie presented, he did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanelly busied, in leuellling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue been corrected well enough, if entering as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the wals, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his countenance beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most ready to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sefac, Hazeael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ioas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the familie of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had bene officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnauoided feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon euery advantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather chosse by desperate resolution, to correct the euills growne out of their former cowardise, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakness of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard teames, so that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the State, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himself and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many inuolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptorie words made the French bebinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to bee paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatseuer hee had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Joas, as shall anon bee shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vually drawes euery Citizen to saue his own, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertain hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Joas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Iuda, which had been more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce it self, & giue him a check vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being vpon returne, and better loden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Joas, and keepe it down from aspiring to the Crown of Iuda; it appears that some what was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet; who when this Joas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that hee should no officer smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seauenth yeeres yeeres of Joas after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could hee haue either seen the Iudaea one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisba, that after three victories, Joas should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse, we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Reigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the king at his return was not able to remedie; but rather fell himself into new misfortunes, which increased the calamity; wee may evidently perceiue in that which is spoken of Ieroboam his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preferred them by the hand of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas. This is enough to proue, that the victorious Reigne of Joas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Abeliah, and Hazeel, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craffus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceiued against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Country, to bid him battell in open field, and to recover by a new charge the honor which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these) Joas was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of Iuda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad wel-come, and being vtterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsook also his life in few moneths after; leauing his kingdome to Ieroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant sonne.

The end of Amasia his Reigne and Life.

Any man is able to ghesse how Amasia looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatening to worke wonders, and set vp a new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncafed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing to terrible a beast as he had beene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that falls vpon an insolent man, feldeme failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amasia (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of those calamities which happen by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of War, being himselfe a Dastard; but when hee was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amasia, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so dear a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they haue made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard march, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soon haue been rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when hauing trusted vp his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue serued to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good K. deliuered vp hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappy king: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But wee finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem: a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduersity of his faults, shall sooner be thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to reuoke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Priests and Prophets were less welcome to him, than euer they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be masters, wanted not plausable matter to reuiew him. For he was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had bene overcome in battell. David himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it, before the enemy was in sight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Asa might so easily haue bene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesai in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessitie of the State. Belike those tradurers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather lue to punish them, than dye to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeede that commanded to set open the gates to Asa; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandments, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had he been as hasty to dye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to reach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those to whom he trusted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, hee commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saved; the enemy hauing wisely preferred the surprize of a Lion that was Capitaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euen so indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (so long he out-liued his honor) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernment, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuerer man. For the affected fowlenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauity of one that is wise: and the feare vvherein they lue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, vvherein, by vsell vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they do vsually mis-spent, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine & deceiueable course; procuring in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence, especially vvhhen an vnable spirit, being ouer-perted with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office; as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreame rigour to hold vp his reputation, vvhhat did he else than strue to make the people think he hated them, vvhhen of themselves they were apt enough to beleue that he did not loue them? the best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his own security: but vvhho should take vengeance (or vpon whom?) of such a murderer, vvherein euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, vvhho had not giuen commandment or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazias, careless of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections, so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong fury, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driven to fortifie the Citie, and flyeth Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But for maintenance, was hee hated conceiued against him, and so generally, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionlesse hee chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found hee there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands; for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that hee might haue made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territorie of the Philistines, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore may seeme that hee was detained there, where certainly it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the general infection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his body to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazias.

It hath already bene shewed, that the Reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to bee measured by compleat yeeres, otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Reigne, or the foremost of his sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crown of Iuda lay voyd cleauen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleued, were it not proued by necessary consequence. Twice we finde it written, that Amazias, King of Iuda, liued after the death of Ioas King of Israel fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazias was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of Amazias was made king ouer Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Azarias, who is also called Azarias, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was cleauen yeeres later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam; for it is expresse, that Azarias began to reigne in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam; so it is expresse, that Azarias began to reigne in the seuen and twentieth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of cleauen yeeres cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voyd time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seauen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like words are nowhere else interpreted in the like sense) that Azarias was cleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, five yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concur with the seauen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the Text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seauen for seauenteene yeeres; and so, by making the seauenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the coniectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azarias began his Reigne being five yeeres old; but then must we adde those cleauen yeeres which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoid an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessity necessity hath enforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the kingdome of Israel: The space of time betwene Israhams death, and the beginning of Zachariabs Reigne, and such another gap found between the death of Pekah, and the beginning of Hosias, haue made it easily to be admitted into Samaria; which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Adamasia was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yet although the necessity of computation were not so apparant.

For the publicke furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. Wee neede not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of Regality, is neuertheless exposed to many iniuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetfull subiects.

As for their copicature, who make Azarias to haue bene King but one and fortie yeeres, after hee came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the Text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam cleauen yeeres of Reigne with his Father, before hee began to reigne single in the fifteenth of Amasia; did it not swallow vp almost the whole reigne of Iosis, and extending the yeeres of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were onely current) and take at the shortest the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainely in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amasia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes liuing with Amasia, and in the cleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Iosis and Ieroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognus Phereclis, and Aripbron in Athens, in Lacedæmon Theclis, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achæians, Gerathæ, Amyclæ, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amasia, succeeding his father Oeraces or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty yeeres, and was slaine the last of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Reigne of Azarias. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand, two hundred and forty yeeres. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In these voluptuous courses he liued an vnhappy life, knowing himselfe to be so vile, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, & struing to counterfeite an harlot, that hee thought it a great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subiection, hee was much encouraged by the prediction of Belsus or Belosus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the prophetic, did promise vnto Belosus himself the gouernment of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the businesse, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed forty thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes he carried away the better, driuing Arbaces and his followers into such fearful termes, that had not Belosus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Camp. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to assit the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the vway, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces ioynded themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great security was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so vveaken the kings heart, that leauing his vviues brother Salamennus to keep the field, he vvithdrew himself into the City of Niniue; vvith, till new aides that hee sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it hauing bene prophetic, that Niniue should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strenght of Niniue, enough hath bene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so vvell victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamennus) was faine to lye two vvhole yeeres before it, in hope to vvinne it by famine; vvhereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemed that he wanted Engines and skill to force those vvalls, vvith vvhere a hundred foote high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that vvith he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne vvith raines, it not onely drowned a part of the city through vvith it ranne, but threw downe twenty furlongs of the vvall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified vvith the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, vvith his vvives, eunuchs, and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, vvherewith hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, wheron was found an inscription, shewing that hee built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drink, and make merry, encouraging others, vvith verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life; by his owne example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end, saying that Arbaces, when hee first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him vvith a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees vvith this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesius a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, vvhere the truth might best be known.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensiue or else defensiue armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesius, because they did nothing vvorthy of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that vvith Theopompus and Thucydides hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed the names of them.

Of Vzzia.

S. I.

The prosperitie of Vzzia, and of Ieroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel, Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Ieroboam. Of Zacharia, Salum, Menahem and Pekahia.

Vzzia, who is also called Abazia, the sonne of Iotham, was made king of Iuda, when hee was sixteen yeeres old, in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the sonne of Iaa king of Israel. Hee serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Iuda. He ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the maiestie ouer some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosephus rehearseth his acts) hee began with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seauen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand and sixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the king prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Armes requisite; following therein happly a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessours had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude, carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Nobles.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of all that had reigned in Iuda, since the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had bene kings betwene him and Salomon. For, besides that great conquests are wonne to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. He turned his Lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds conuenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattell feeding; whereof hee might well keepe great store, hauing wonne so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground seruing for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towres in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisternes or Ponds, Iosephus calls them Water-courses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towres hee commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith; questionlesse hee tooke the onely course, by which hee might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of Trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Townes among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Iaa had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelve Tribes into two kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, so (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Iaa, king of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, hee wan the Royall citie of Damascus, and hee wan Hamath, with all the country therabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the wilderness, that is, (as the most expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the Reigne of Dauid.

But

But it was not for the piety of Ieroboam, that he thrived so well; for hee was an Idolater: it was onely the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, wherinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites vnder the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehoua, to which God had promised the kingdom of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefites, as it had been at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Iaa, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it selfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehoua from that politike Idolatry; nor the misery falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Ieroboam the sonne of Iaa, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehoua, that his sons, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who finde no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the sonne of Iaa, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeeres, had ended his life; it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his sonne, should forthwith haue been admitted, to reign in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs haue appeared bafe; and the vertue of the last king, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme consent, receiued as king. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue bene wanting, vpon which, the wisdom of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the army (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in fourteen yeeres there reigned fiftie kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdom asunder, holding each what hee could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia, until, after many yeeres, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the son of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three & twenty yeeres, we find by the difference of time, between the fiftieyth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seauen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last sixe months wherof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeede, that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father eleauen yeeres, do cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelve yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the kingdom of the ten Tribes was no lesse distemper'd, than as is already noted. But I choole rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times, of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fifty yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Reigne vnto his owne; which was it selfe indeed so long, that hee may well seeme to haue begun it very young: for I do not think, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer reign, and with a longer life, than hee did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the Throne of Israel was voyde, before the reigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to bee said of his Reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely vvas hee king; in which time hee declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues, which vvas enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, vvhich hee vvas slaine. Hee vvas the last of Iehoua's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line, vvhich may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the propheticke hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iehoua, for the slaughter of Ieroboam, and for the eradication of Abahs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia having bene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde, save onely that hee was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now when all other Competitors were fitten downe, thought easily to prevaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphah or Thapfa, and the coast thereof, cuen from Tirzah, where Menabem his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his head, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menabem who reigned in his place.

Menabem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphah, and all that were therein, or therabouts, but he ript vp all their women with childe, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty bene vfed in reuenge of Zacharia death, it is like that he would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vfed such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdain, and other private passions, to haue bene the causes of this beauly outrage.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel, whom this new King appealed, with a thousand talents of silver, leuied vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) sought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Ioseph reports of this Menabem, that his Reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeeres, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for he reigned onely two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Pekah, the sonne of Remaliah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shalbe. There needs no more to be said of Menabem, and his sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northern Nations the way into Palastina; it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belosus (called also Belses, and by some, Phul Belochus) who ioynd with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happines wherein we left him.

S. II.

The end of Vzzia his Reigne and Life.

XS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preferue the lineage of Dauid, in the person of Ioa; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred borne to his Father Azaria, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the daies of Zacharia (which vnderstood the vision of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when hee was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for hee transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity been so helpfull to the kings of Juda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from inchoching thereupon: yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoeuer, the king forgot his duty, the Priests remembered theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, that God himselfe persecuted. Wherein Iosephus sayes, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee had taken Azaria and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeed, enlargeth the Story, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that cowed foure furdings, till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high wayes; and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roofof of the Temple did cleaue, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face; which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue bene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they doe much misse reckon the times. For the Earth-quake (spoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirty yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iobam the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this account, haue bene then vnborne: for he was but five and twenty yeeres old, when he began to reigne as King. Therefore, thus farre onely we haue assurance; that while Vzzia was with the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his forehead, beset the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to lye in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house; and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead, whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because hee was a Leper.

S. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt; and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Iael, Amos, Obadiah, and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Iael or Obadiah did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expresse, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporary with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these fue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour, yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painfully bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Iuas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophesied in the daies of Ioa, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse; by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose daies Nineue was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the reigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the foure great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esay was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, for their opinion is recited, who thinke him to haue bene the sonne of Amos the Prophet; and the high account wherein hee liued; but for the excellency, both of his stile & argument, wherein hee so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet, hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an History of matters already past.

Boochoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeere of his Reigne, by our computation (where.

whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Vezia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Inda.

After the death of Sacharis, Affshis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt: vnto him succeeded Amphis; and these two occupied that Crowne sixe yeeres. Then Sabaum, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres; whereof the ten first ranke along with the last of Vezia his Reigne and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermixed with the busines of Inda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Atriphron his twenty, the seuen and twentieth of Thespius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Aeschylus his three and twenty, made euen with the two and fifty of Vezia: as likewise did in Alba the last seuen of Siluius Anentinus his seuen and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Siluius Prius, and two and twenty the first of Siluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome, in the first of Vezia, wherein, after eight and twenty yeeres, his Sonne Sofarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Affrian Empire, betwene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainty in the Story of the Affrian kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

S. IIII.

Of the Affrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belofus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a-part in Nineue and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly bene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be iudged by him, receiuing by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was showne vpon Belofus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold, not onely the City and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embelzling whereof his life had bene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soueraignty to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nineue, permitting the Citizens neuerthelesse to take and carry away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Babylonians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reins of his owne Soueraignty, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde in the Scriptures to haue held some Townes of the Medes; and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernment, by reducing them into stricter tearmes of obedience.

How the force of the Affrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, & tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered, not only in regard of the destruction of Nineue, & subuersion of the Affrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honor, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Affrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe therunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a-part the severall authorities & arguments of sundry men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: to which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forcible, though to others they may perhaps appeare weak.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belofus was the same King, who, first of the Affrians, entred Palestina with an Army; being called Phul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annins his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belofus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtil, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty yeeres, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglas-phalassar his Sonne, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annins his Metasthenes were sufficient prooffe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptory herein. But, howsoever Annins his Authors deserue to bee suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no History at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Babylonians, who ioyned with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third person was so eminent, as to haue Affria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Affrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparant, that the destruction of Nineue by Arbaces, & the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe from aspiring to recouer the Soueraignty, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

40 Vpon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouer-dangerous, euen to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Affrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Phul? or what must this Phul haue beene (of whose descents, or entermedings, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofus; whose neer Neighbourhood gaue him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Affria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and siluer that had bin in the Palace of Nineue. And questionlesse to restore such a City as Nineue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Phul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Phul been a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Affria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Army, seeking booty as farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers haue called Belofus, Deleses, and Belstus, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Atliages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares, then is this scruple vtterly remoued. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus hauing settled his affaires in Affryia towards the East and North, might with good leisure encrease vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may finde euery one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who ioyued with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, merely for the loue of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitful Prouince, adioyning to their baraine quarters, might yearly doe them inestimable pleasures; was not onely likely to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie neighbour of Ieroboam, recovered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco and clearing the coast of Arabia, from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamanah of the Hebrews Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, diuided by Euphrates, hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memory whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuier came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning so farre off as Ninene, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that was in the tenn Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belofus was either vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was fauourable, and first discouered. This might haue compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did passe the riuier of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous iourney, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we haue made it: for three and twenty yeeres leisure would haue afforded better opportunity, which ought not to haue been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deiaces the Medes. Now, though it bee hold an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regarfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some haue coniectured that all Affryia was giuen to Belofus (as an ouerplus, besides the Promise of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deseruings; yet the opinion more commonly receiued, is, that hee did onely encrease vpon that Prouince by little and little, whilst Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeeres betwene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Nabonassar his Reigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Affryia, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the restauration of Ninene, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Reigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belofus were one person, so far as much as the iourney of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belofus could finde leisure; & the time of aduantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that he who conquered Affryia, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrey so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to haue beene, at least, named in some Historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to haue beene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Affryians, done in those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Affryians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine & vtter desolation of Ninene, must needs haue so weakened the state of Affryia, that it could not in thirty yeeres space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Ninene, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to subdue it, vvhich hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded vwith the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Seythians, & other war-like Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuill dilution of the inhabitants, & the bordering enuy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alleadged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belofus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artabastus, and Ahasuerus, vwith the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, vvhich prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countreies, haue called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of old, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, vvhich they alleadged in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affryian and Babylonian Kings, vvhich are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomically obseruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus, or Belstus were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Ninene & in Babylon; if he were father of Tahar, Phul, Asar, from whom Salmanassar, Sennacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanassar; who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeeres, which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Alexandach, who supplanted Asarhaddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Affryian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were severall Kings. This consequence is so plaide, that it needes no confirmation: To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon; and not of Affryia. This is proued by his name; which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salmanassar, the first part of Salmanassars name; is proper to the Affryians.

It is likewise proued by the Astronomical obseruations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy drawes that Epecha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and inore strongly, it is confirmed by the successe of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esay his prophetic, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar; which in Greece or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, wherinto Salmanassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign ouer Babylon in the sixtyeare of Hezekias, at which time Salmanassar tooke Samarit; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea & Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioseph Scaliger; ywho not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belofus, for the prouing that Phul and Belofus were not sundry Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, how much I beleue nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I notwithstanding, that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellows alledged in it: I haue (somewhat peraduenture too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and setueth to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger tearmes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, (such Writers as a man should bee ashamed or vnwilling to reade. For to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in general) Gerard Mercator, is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betwene Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men remarkably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaliger's reasons bee enough to proue. For though Nabonassar bee a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two seuerall names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnia viderunt, Prophetas I know nos who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the contrary. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans; doth not proue him to haue bene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the first, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spain; and Lords of the Netherlands; had men farre more learned in all Sciences, Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subiects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then liuing in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posterity will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, & Babylonian Schollers: but it seemes, that hee and his posterity, by giuing themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise Philip lost partly, & partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vn-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary side) one of them vvch is drawne from the unlike found and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man vvill dispute; for it is not likeness of found, but agreement of time; and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not king of Babylon it selfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing faue coniecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardocempadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the sixtyeare of Hezekias, I finde matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these obiections vntill I meet with their subiect in his proper place; vvch will bee vvhen wee come to the time of Hezekias, vvherin Merodach liued and vvvas King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scuple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre vvill I here satisfie him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had beene deceeded.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their Story, vvho calling Pul to bee a distinct person from Belofus or Belosus, haue in like sort, as was necessarily, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, vvch left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And heere I must first confesse my vwant of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the body of this History, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, vvhom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: but Serabus Caluissus himselfe, vvho hath abridged Scaliger's learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not beene careful to giue vs notice, how long Belofus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Palsars did reigne; (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person vvith Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I find it contriued by Augustinus Tornicius; vvho onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belofus, and his Posterity, of vvhom hee hath the like remembrance. This Tornicius is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, vvho's Annales were printed the last yeare; he appeares to me a man of a curious industry; found iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, vvillfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by vvho's Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his vvorkes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this business hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, vvho's helpe, vvithout wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe vvhat right vvith Tornicius; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and vvith that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed mee in some things, so vvould he haue instructed and emboldned me, to vvrite more fully and less timorously in other things, vvch now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that coniecture; vvch I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and bene expoled to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vally of Sidaim, and were slaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably bee thought to haue bene some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mighty, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belofus, and they two pretuaied to farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, between Othianus, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another coniecture is (for Tornilius offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to passe, by the iust iudgement of God, to that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Vice-Royes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Tornilius himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Having thus deuised, how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, he orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty yeeres. Theglathalassar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I vwrite diuerly, according to the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuerfifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned scuen; and when he was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne ten yeeres; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore for so it had bene more likely) Belofus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight yeeres; at the least threescore and eight yeeres did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, vvhom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Badadan, are assigned fixe and twenty yeeres: then two and fifty to Meroдах, or Mardocempadus: foure and twenty to Ben Meroдах; and lastly, one and twenty to Nabonassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, vvhose is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the coniectures of other men, who giue all to Belofus, and confound him vvvith Phul, appeare to me more needrely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornilius would haue conceived two different vvaies, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddain King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vnlesse his desert (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuised the meanes, wherby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would anew doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betwene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians: yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuill Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of? Questionlesse, the interturing of some Treasures by Belofus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Wardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoyded; but that eyther we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the coniecture, inferring such a sequence, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeeres, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of liberty) euen the Aedes, that were vnder his owne Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings, not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in general. If it be so vnlawfull to thinke, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reigne in Assyria eight and forty yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and iudicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not belieued for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes wee make vse of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are vnwilling our selues to be Authors of new, though not vnprofitable coniectures. Herein we shall haue this commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whom vve shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalassar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of fixe and twenty yeeres the one, and seauenteene the other; Tornilius hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his own computation; vsing the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, laue our good Metaphyses, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reigne, it is more than I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Tornilius giues the same length of reigne, vvhich is found in Metaphyses. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto themselves, as may very well be allowed vnto a man so iudicious as is Tornilius; and yet I could wish that hee had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this businesse, wherein hee himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans, filling vp all the space betwene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight yeeres of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belofus might haue begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threescore and eighty yeeres would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any vvhich of his age abated by shortning his reigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeed, eight and forty yeeres had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seemes by the story to haue bene little lesse, at such time as he ioyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty yeeres, did well deserue that note (which Tornilius aduisedly giues) that if his reigne extended not so far, then the reigne of such as came after him, occupied the mid-dle time, vnto Nabonassar.

Neither doe we reprehend the boldnesse of Tornilius, in coniecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Seclus Calvisius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blanke, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rockes of loades, Mounts with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediable obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

—Nec feruimus
Partim in scalaribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ simitimum Latas, Duratq; sole Niues,
Adorcatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt aquora Nautæ.

Nor

Nor Southerne heate, nor Mortherne snow
 That freezing to the ground doth grow,
 The subiect Regions can fence,
 And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
 The subtle Shipmen way will finde, Storme neuer lo the Seas with Winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called coniectures) painted in Maps, doe serue only to mis-lead such discouersers as rashly belecue them; drawing vpon the publishers, either some angry curses, or well deserved scorne; but, to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretty iest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had bene employed by his King in planting a Colony vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which, mee thought, might haue done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprize, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wines Island; saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Country for her; that she, in imagination, might haue an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blanks of old Histories, wee need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our coniectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if we haue it not already) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it bee more shame to haue beleued in the meane while, Annius or Tornielius, than to haue beleued nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit, which wee giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornielius, than Annius, yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their coniecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacuvius in Capuadid with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the City to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty; for as fast as euery name was read, all the town cried, Let him die: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered, to be reiectet: so that finding the worse and lesse choice, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lacke of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this diuision of the Affrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the same King Vezzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeere. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus in the first of Iobam: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weighty enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we ioyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of actiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foote; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his body. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neere vnto Eliu; where also

Jupiter

Jupiter's Temple in Eliu, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from euery fourth yeere compleat, in the plains of Eliu, a City of Peloponnesus, neere the river Alphemus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeeres, till Iphitus, by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reigne of Theodosius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: others thinke that they were disolued vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times, and their stories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Pliny giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Cassor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solan had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true yeere of the World, and the reigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Ofias, or Asarabab.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himselfe in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and sixth yeere after Troy, yet he telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeere of Vezzia, which is (as I finde it) two yeeres later.

Erastosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven yeeres after Troy, reckoning the yeeres that passed betwene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The difference betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastosthenes. From the taking of Troy, to the descent of Hercules his Posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeeres; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeeres, from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine, and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeeres. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeeres from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue been in the four hundredth and eight yeere current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that City, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, must needs teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vse, we haue the ensuing yeeres, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided by the same Erastosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundredth fourescore and seuentene yeeres; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and forty yeeres; forwards to the victory of Lyfander, seven and twenty; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirty foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to 453. yeeres; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one & fiftieth yeere of Vezzia, we haue arguments grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sunne; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first yeere of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty yeeres: they who giue him but twenty nine yeeres of reigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iustine, Eusebius, and others) begin a yeere later, which comes to de Iem. all all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first year of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, forsooth well to leade vs backe to the beginning of Cyrus, as many the like obseruations do. For if wee reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, wee finde two hundred and thirty yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, vvch lasted but seven yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seven yeeres, vvch was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (vvch was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad), and the two hundredth and fortieth yeere from the institution of those games by Iphitus, followed the last of the seventy yeeres of the captiuitie of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon backe those seventy yeeres, and one hundred threecore and ten yeeres more, the last vvch passed vnder the Kings of Iuda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; vvch by this account is the one and fiftieth of Vzziah, as we haue already noted.

The Eclipses vvhereof we made mention, serue vvell to the same purpose. For examples like; that vvch vvvas scene when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundredth threecore, and seventh yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threecore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs back vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threecore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vzziah.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastery in those feats, vvhereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises, that serued onely for ostentation. Thurther also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended vvch of them should get the honour of hauing plaide the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; vvho's iustice, in pronouncing vvithout partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlandes of Palme, or Oliue, vvithout any other commodity following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had scene his three sonnes crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him vvith this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in celum ascensus es; that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou hast not climed vp to heauen: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Hiorace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Such as like heauenly wights doe come
With an Elzan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, vvch had wonne those Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter vvorthy of their noting. Such as Tully counts it the vanity of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to haue wonne the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous vvictorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fiftieth fiftieth day of the Moneth Hecatombeon, vvch doth answer to our Iune; and vvhat means they vsed to make the Moneth begin vvith the new Moone, that the fiftieth day might be the full, I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, & leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, vvhom I shall meet in more serious employments, vvhen the Persian quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellefpont.

§. VI.

Of Iotham and his Contemporaries.

Iotham the sonne of Vzziah, when he was five and twenty yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threecore cubits yppright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forreys, Towers and Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundredth talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned fixe and twentie yeeres: of vvhom Iosephus giues this testimonie: Eius modi vero princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virginitatis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iuste presuerit, orbem ipsam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere anxius, ut uniuersum regnum hostibus quidem contemnendum, domesticis autem simul inuictis atque cinibus felix, sanctum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit. Thus vvvas such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee vvorshipped God so religiously, hee gouerned his men so righteously, hee vvvas so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplyfy it, that by his vertue and proffesse he made his vvhole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his reigne was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchmenes about this time succeeded Phelsteus in Corinth: after vvhom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, vvch gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, vvith Strabo and Plutarch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, vvho droue them out.

Tiglathphalassar, or Tiglathpelefer, the son of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that vvvas of this new race, about this time inuaded Israel, vvch Pekah (vvho murdered his Master Pekaiab) vvvas King therof. In vvch Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephthali and Galile, vvith those of Gilead, ouer Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius findes, that vvith his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeeres longer: vvch yeeres I vvould not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins vvith his single reigne, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, vvho therewith reigned 27. yeeres.

Aeschylus, the sonne of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. yeeres. Alcamenes gouerned Sparta: after vvhom, the Estate changed, according to Enghius. But therein surely Enghius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others vvitness the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vvirtues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. yeeres, and out-liued the Messenian warre: vvch vvvas ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicanor, his royall companion.

At this time liued Nabum the Prophet, vvho fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Ninewe, vvch succeeded (vvith Iosephus) a hundred & fifteen yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, vvch in Media, Sesarmus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

§. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seauenteenth yeere of Pekah, the son of Remaliah: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reigne, vvho began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his son for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calf, set vp not far from Ierusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gibinnam, or Uphes, from whence the word Cobenna is vfed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the car-kasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cimbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pitifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnaturally, cruell, and diuellish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which Saint Hierome vpon the tenth of Maribow hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhominacion which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations, cometh from Iudea, diuers Authors witness, as Virgil in the second of Æneid.

Sanguine placitū, &c. and Siluius. — Pescere cadē Deos: Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many soules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Herculus commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in somuch, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them beleefe, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp, and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeate him: who besides these forenamed Nations, had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his seruices. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosia writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull seruitude, in which hee also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Ahaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliab, King of Israel against him, who invaded Iudea, and besieged Ierusalem, but entered it not.

2 Chron. 28. 6.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himselfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Iews out of it; and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Iudeans, of the best of the kingdom, at which time Masfiah, the Sonne of Achaz was also slaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his house, and Eleanath the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women & children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

2 Chron. 28.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iuda on the North, so the Edomites and the Philistines, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudea, entred vpon them from the South, and tooke up Thisenes, Atalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Tinnah, and Gemo, slew many people, & carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe enuironed on all sides, & that his Idols and dead gods gaue him no comfort, he sent to the Assyrian Tiglathpileser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the siluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings House.

2 Kings 16.

Tiglathpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, king of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudea, invited by Menahem, king of Israel. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belachus himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time forgoing through with this enterprize: because (as I haue said before, he was) not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first invaded the Territorie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Achaz. At Damascus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent it to Vriah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath posselt all Iosaph, and and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Sad, and Manasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Assur, or rebeld against him, and therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Achaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the kings of Iuda.

10 With Achaz liued Medius, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned 40 yeeres, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias find Anticarmus in stead of this Medius, to haue beene Eusebius Chri. Sofarmus his Successor, to whom they giue 50 yeeres.

Tiglath Pileser held the Kingdom of Assyria, all the reigne of Achaz; yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. For we find that Achaz did send vnto the Kings of Assur to helpe him. The Genea note saies, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Domini- on. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither find any Historie, nor circumstance that pro- ueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his 2 King 18. 16.
 10 Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath beene said before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had beene hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedemon, a hundred and thirty yeeres after Lycurgus according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fiftieth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then ioynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Achaz died Aschylus, who had ruled in Athenes euery since the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia. Alcemonon the thirteenth of the Medontides, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Cadmus) succeeded his Father Aschylus, and was the last of their Gouernours: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from kings (after Cadmus) to Gouernours for life; which ending in this Alcemonon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Burghomaster, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke begins, in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad, Eusebius and Halicarnassians in the first of the sixteenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The kingdom of the Latines, gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Sylui, of the race of Æneas, tooke end in the same Achaz time: the foundation of Rome, being laide by Romulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the same king. Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should, others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias, Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassians, Solinus, Antiochens, Clemens, Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the sixteenth: who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best accompt.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

And here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations posselt it before the arriual of Aeneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Anfona, the one name arising of the seate, the other of the Anfones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassus thinkes to haue bene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus:

Terra antiqua, posens armis, atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducū de nomine, gentem.*

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie:
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or king may haue bin, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrey, and wome out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the originall of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrey, Reineccius hath made a very painfull search, and not improble coniecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnassus, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustine, who saith, that Brundisium was a Colonie of the Ætolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirms the fame of Temisa or Tempisa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall, from them he brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Athalia, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Aethalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolie Dialect, of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Heereunto appertaines that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greekes cousins of the Latines. Also the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Iannus, and the Fable of Iannus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Iannus, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sailing ouer the Ionian Sea, that lies betwene Æthalia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disprooued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kistim, then was he the son of Iannus, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldest son of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie, but calleth Electra & her sister Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigines; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus bene one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, we need the lesse to regard it; for that Reineccius himselfe, whose coniectures are more to be valued than the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appears by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not haue said, — Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducū de nomine gentem, had that name bene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeares before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italie began: & seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus written in Greece Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neyther is it more hard to deriue the name of Italus from Ætolus, than Italia from Æthalia. So may *Virgil*s authoritie stand well with the collections of Reineccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which hee and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians hauing held the greatest part of it vnder their subiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoever Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia and North of Africke.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassus, Varro, and Reineccius (following them) thinke to haue bin Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as original, or native of the place, which they possessed; which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moone; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus enforced to forsake their seates so oft as other Greekes were, who did dwell without that halfe Island, neyther had the Arcadians so vsure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrey was lesse fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of access, & they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore, hauing occupied a great part of Latium, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours there by had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somewhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bin Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of children, in which those ages abounded, enforced the superfluous companie to seeke another seat, & that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Euander, into the same parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelagi, an ancient Nation, vvho sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Anjones, Arunci, Kastili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne vvvas brought to some ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Sterculius, and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Countie or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which cyther by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did mainedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life; and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painful, therefore they named the Riuer Stryx of Hate, Cycnus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greek λαοι people, and λίθι stones, are neere in sound, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion stones conuerted into men, as at other times men into stones: in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturnus hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deo, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abscondens se. For it cannot be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it be deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynecius doth coniecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Iauan, vvvere the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by 30 Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy; Heereupon Reynecius gathers, that their abode was in Asia; viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Eolians held in Asia, called Elea, or Elai, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidemu, or (according to the Greece writing) Cidamus, which name last rehearfed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greece Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakenesse of vtterance, which is found betwene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Citim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Pregenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaists, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Atolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Eolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elau, the Hauen Elex, the people Elaita, the Citie Elaus, Elia, and Elateia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from vvhence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some deriuing the Sabines from him giue the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia be named of the Ceteans Latinius. Reynecius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Ange, the daughter of Aleus king of Arcadia vvvas slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre; when did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans, who fearing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affairs of Troy should be ill) passed into that part of Italie, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reynecius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Ange, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinius. That this name of Elatus may haue bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas king of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countie: and betwene these two Families the succession in that kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippothens of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name of Latinius, hauing a deriuatiue found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the coniecture of Reynecius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparant truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, vvwhich haue vvritten the originals of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Aeneas his coming.

10 THe kings which reigned in Latium before the arriual of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Fannus, and Latinius. Of Saturne there is nothing remembered, saue what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applicable to this man, it is for him to iudge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them νεμερς, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he liued, may very well admitt him to haue bin the same; but the names of Sterces, and Sterculius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foylc which they laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

30 Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the sight and chattering of Fowles, Fannus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus king of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fanna, called Fatma, the sister of Fannus, who was also his Wife, as all Historians agree, she was held a Prophetesse, & highly commended for her chastitie, which praise in her multitude haue bin much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meere incestuous. It is not mentioned that Fannus had by his sister any child, neither doe we read of any other Wife which he had, saue onely that Virgil giues vnto him Latinius as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, saue onely that her aboad was about the Riuer Lironeere Minturne.

Of the name Latinius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Son of Fannus, another of Hercules, a third of Plusses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Chers were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecius, the difference consisting almost inplus onely, that Suidas calls Telephus, the son of Hercules, whereas Reynecius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinius hauing obtained the succession in that kingdome after Fannus, did promise his onely Daughter and Heire Laetitia, to Turnus the son of Venilia, who was sister to Angeta Latinius his Wife.

But when Aeneas arriued in those parts with fiftene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarcked according to the rare vvich Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then vied, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinius finding that it would stand best with his assistance, to make alliance with the Troians, and moued vvith the great reputation of Aeneas, vvich himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed here-herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre: which vvvas soone ended vvith his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arriual of Aeneas; vnlesse we should vvholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetes into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, vvho serued in the last yeare of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall, that Lavinia vvvas borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassus call her, vvvas not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro, vvho calleth her Palatia: vvvhich name very vvell might be deriued from the Greek name Pallus, Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by vvvhich the High Priest called euery Virgin, vvvhom he tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; vvvhether it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it vvvas ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

S. IIII.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Gouernors of Alba.

Aeneas himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardaniens: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his vvife Cressa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius, vvvhose surname vvvas Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin furnished Iulus. But when Aeneas vvvas dead, his vvife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great vvith child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, & furnished Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, & vsing her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, vvvhether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place, Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had build and called after his new vvives name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, & therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight & twentie years: Virgil giues him thirtie, others siue and thirtie, & eight and thirtie. After his decesse, there arose contention betwene Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enioyed, leauing the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterwards called Sylvij.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, vvith the continuance of each mans reigne, I find thus set downe:

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latins founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Priscae Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuier Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus king of the Albanes: who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Ensebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome, Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Agessphar, was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sonnes, either by her vnkle Amulius, as some thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their vnkle commanded to be drowned, & the mother buried quick, according to the law, which so ordained, when the Vesta Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Amulius, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preferred, who afterward reuenged the cruelty of their vnkle, vvith the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the kingdome: wherein how long he reigned, I find not; neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome, vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome, and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Claudius who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, king of the Romans, making vvayre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Melius Sufferius, the successor of Clutius, vvvhich surrendered the Estate of Alba vnto the Romans, hauing committed the hazzard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, vvvhich decided the quarrell by Combat: in vvvhich, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romans, preuailed against the Curatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Melius (following Tullus Hostilius vvith the Albanes forces against the Volentes and Fidenates) vvvhich drew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romans to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale vvith; Tullus, vvvhich notwithstanding this fallshood, obtained the victorie, did reward Melius vvith a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then vvvas Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among vvvhich vvvere the Iulij: of vvvhich C. Iulius Caesar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Soueraignie of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; vvvhich by the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was reuiuied, that seldome, if euery one Familie hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

S.V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

Of Rome, vvvhich deuoured the Alban kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, vvvhich (though somewhat vnertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betwene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing bene the worke of many Ages; vvvhich I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Quintus Fabius Pictor, Per-

time Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, & others, seeked to deriue the Romans from Iouis: but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equal credit, giue the Gracians for their ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor ad argumentum colligit, Romanos à Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græcorum, antiquo instituto, Herculis rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque Euandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Romanæ Historiographi, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifice to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Euander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembered many founders of that Citie: as Romulus the son of Rhysses and Circe; Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Remus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Herasclides giues the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Februa, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Civitate Dei. But Linie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his comforts, Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their original, answered in these Verses:

Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Ans pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shephard was, or elfe, that Ile forbear.
meaning, either a Shephard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nursed by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shephards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis, the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour, to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me, that he might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he iniuriously held the kingdom; the other, to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddess Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merouet, king of the Franks, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Les them belene it that list, Il le croira qui vouldra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetically inuentions: but to answer these imaginations in general, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had bene rauished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had knowne Venus. But Rom was made with childe by some man of of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouet might fancie a Sea Captaine, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Eneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beaute Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolfe, which was Lupus, or Lupina; for the Curtians in those dayes were called Wolfes, que natus (saith Halicarnassus) bonitarii vocabulo amice appellantur, which are now by an hepteter name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Eneas vanished away by the River Numicus: but but thereof Linie also speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree, that there was an vnaturall darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might be slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Pompey (slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Caius the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tygre, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, & by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destinie followed most 10 of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the seventh king after him: who when he had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himselfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassus end this dispute: whose words are these: They (saith he) who drew nearest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that when his mother was rauished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darkenesse like vnto night, & that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth 20 containe besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had soone bin forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of bodie, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vse of wine & delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, & neglect to reuenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdom, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeers first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time, the Souerainty fel into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknown; & more Priest-like than King, like wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath 30 somethat resembled this King. For hauing long bin sole Gouverneffe till Constantino ple shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraigne enemies, and the Latines dispoyle of Imperiall power, she fell into the subiection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, & therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being diuened from luxurie to defenseless armes; and therein hauing bin vnfortunate, at length betakes herselfe againe to the Crozier staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of king Abaz, during whose reigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezekia, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezekias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomies, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

50 The first yeere of Abaz his Reigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteen yeares taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his son. This appears by the Reigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which began in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia; so it follows, that Ezekia began to reigne in his Fathers fourteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeere of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezekia began, and fo the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hofea began his kingdom, when the twelfth yeere of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the meane how to disioyne the first of Ezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeare later, of which yeare, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

In the fourteenth yeere of Ezekia, Senacherib, invading Juda and the Countiees adjoining, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heaven, fled home, and was slaine. The yeare following it was that God added fifteene yeares to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned foureteen of his nine and twenty; and the same yeere was that miracle seene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scutler, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twenty fift of April, in the Indian yeare, being then Thursday. I haue not seene any workes of Scutler; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. Howsoeuer it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia agreed vpon; and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsuall in all cases, that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, and Ezekia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehosaphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whilst his Father liued, wee haue already said enough.

Of this godly king Ezekias, we find, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngriuous Father, who had out-worne his reputation, gaue way to his Sons proceedings, which perps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeare and first moneth of his reigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernment, we plainly find it to haue beene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Ahaz had shut vp, cleaned, the Citie and kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bin for many yeares neglected, & brake down the brazen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, & he called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lump of brasse. He did also celebrate the Passe-over with great magnificence, inuiting thercunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his reigne, Salmannassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hofea King of Israel had practised with Sae King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after their inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affria and Media: among whom Tubias, & his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Ninene, in whose Seates and Places the Affrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites; as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Affrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written other wise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmannassar, with other Affrian, Chaldean Kings, diuersity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmannassar, King of Affir, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezekia, kings of Juda, and of Hofea king of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolome makes mention of Nabonnassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmannassar and Nabonnassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnessar, that he was the same, whom Ptolome calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Ischholerus hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betwene Nabonnassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seuen hundred forty and sixe yeares: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmannassar was. One great prooffe hereof is this, which the same Ischholerus alledgeth out of Erasmus Reinboldus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardacepnadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolome, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Meroдах, who sent Embassadors to Hezekia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betwene Meroдах and Salmannassar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardacepnadus and Nabonnassar. Likewise Fernelius doth shew, that whereas, from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeares: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolome, betwene Nabonnassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolome seemes to differ from this account, making Nabonnassar more ancient by an hundred and forty yeares, than the destruction of Ierusalem, we are to vnderstand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeare of his reigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolome. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonnassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seuen yeares: Now if we adde to these one hundred twenty seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnessar yeares, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and forty yeares. In so plaine a case no more proofes are needefull, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolome placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two yeares, after the first of Nabonnassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proueth Baladan the Father of Meroдах, to haue beene this Nabonnassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein: It is true, that the next observations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolome recorded, after the time of Nabonnassar, were in the reigne of Mardacepnadus; the second yeare of whose reigne, is according to Ptolome, concurrent in part with the twenty seuen of Nabonnassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardacepnadus, was from the beginning of Nabonnassar twenty seuen yeares, seuen teene dayes, and cleauen houres: the account from Nabonnassar beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty six of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonnassar and Mardacepnadus, is noted by Ptolome, according to the Egyptian yeares. But how does this proue, that Mardacepnadus or Meroдах, was the Sonne of Nabonnassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardacepnadus to haue beene rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonnassar. For if hee might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne, he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countre-man Lydus hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornilius, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calaisius, who hath drawne into forme of Cronology, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion; confounding Baladan with Nabonnassar: I haue taken time paines to search, as farre as my leifure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or Succession of these two: Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduerse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this businesse) any sentence more neerely prouing the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the neere succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue been Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely goe on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmannassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our Booke, when they find something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemy are assigned to Belosus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomically observations, fitly concurring with the yeares that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudæa from Sennacherib.

When Salmannassar was dead, and his son Sennacherib in possession of the Empire in the fourteenth yeare of Ezekias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on, at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmannassar, inuited by Ahaz, inuaded Rezin King of Damascus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had vndertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezekias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it seemes) purpose to inuade Egypt, sent one part of his Army to lye before Ierusalem. Now though Ezekias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of siluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set down before Lachis in Iudæa; yet vnder the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Iudæa to deliuer hostages, the Assyrian enuironed Ierusalem with a grosse Army, and hauing his sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezekias directed his three great Counsellors, to partly with Rabfices, ouer the Wall, and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeelde themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretary, sent by Ezekias, desired Rabfices to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, & not in the Iewish, yet he with a louder voyce directed his speech to the multitude in their own language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be inforced to eate their own dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Iudæans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whosoever leanech, piercech his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Ezekias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had bene preferred euer since Moses time: and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no meanes to relye on him, for hee would deceiue them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Army, hee himselfe left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and sought Sennacherib, at Libna in Iudæa, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Army of Tarbasa the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezekias, whom hee partly aduised, and partly threatned to submit himselfe: vsing the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezekias sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Esay, which had lately been sent to Rabfices, receiued from him comfort, and assurance, that this heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the Altar Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of Assyria had destroyed the Nations and their Lawes, and had seized on their gods, for they were no gods, but the work of mens hands, even wood and stone, &c.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retrained his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelufium in Egypt, for feare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paripomenon, speake but of the affairs of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth: Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia & Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petra adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sathon King of Egypt, to bee Valeans Priest; and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs return from Pelufium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyle the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarbaca, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent. Saint Hierome vpon the seauen and thirtieth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports Sennacheribs retreat in these words. *Pugnasse autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Aegyptios, & obsidisse Pelusium, iamque curatis aggeribus urbs capiende, venisse Taracham Regem Aethiophum in auxilium, & una nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quinque milia exercitus Assyri pestilentia corripisse, narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaica scriptor Historia, quorum fides depoprijs libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Aegyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarbaca King of the Ethiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night, nere Ierusalem, one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldaean Storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne Bookes. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlle of winde and a tempest, and a flame of deuouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted: *Sennacheribus autem ab Aegyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rabfacer imperio reliquerat peste diminutus immissa deletum, primâ nocte posteaquam urbem oppugnare ceperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque milibus Militum; quaculade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis diuitibus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam que Ninus dicitur. Eripulo post per ingressus Seniorum & filijs suis, Adramelech, & Selenai, vitam amisit: occisis in ipso Templo quod dicitur Aracai; quem precipuo cultu dignabatur, quibus ob patricidium a popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldas minor filius in Regnum successit: Sennacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Egyptian warre, found there his Armie, which hee had left vnder the command of Rabfices, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that hee had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers beeing consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronels. With which destruction beeing terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, hee made great marches into his Kingdom, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech and Selenai or Sharezer, hee lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Araaces, or Nesroth: whom hee especially worshipped. These his Sonnes beeing for their parried, chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Asaracoldas his younger Sonne succeeded in the Kingdom. Who in the beginning of his reigne sent new troupes out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his Grand-father Salmannassar. What this Nesroth was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Venus Frania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belas, as Dion, Ensebins, and Cyrius witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonnes had to murder him; but the most likely it is, that hee had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, that it was fifty five dayes after Senacherib's return, ere hee was murdered by his sonnes; during which time hee slew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineue; till the most iust God turned the sword against his owne brest.

§. III.

Of Ezekias his sicknesse and recovery; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

After this marvellous deliury, Ezekias sickned, and was told by Isaiah, that hee must dye: but after hee had besought God with teares for his deliury, Isaiah, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for nineteene yeares. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because hee had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His diseale seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Borchor Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldaea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house; he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, vvho told him; The treasures are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and what soeuer thy Fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall bee carried into Babel, nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine than euer he had been: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekias had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life; he dyed hauing reigned nine and twenty yeares. One only offense hee made, vvwhich was against the Philistims with good success. Among his other acts (shortly remembered in Ecclesiasticus) he deuised to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he reioyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humbly) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vvurped that State himselfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This aduantage Merodach espied, and remembering, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunity which this Kings weaknesse did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make vse of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazzard, and preuailed. The assertion of this history is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut a sunder the Line of Nimrod, there were only five Kings.

Phul Belochus.	} who reigned	{ 27 10 9 10 6	} yeeres.
Tiglath Philassar.
Salmanassar.
Senacherib.
Assarhaddon.

But forasmuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bin an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezechia, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reigne of Ezechia: Of the difference found between sundry Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezechia: of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

In the time of Ezechia, Medius, and after him Cardicus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sons reigning with the fathers, haue caused not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesius and Annius his Metasthenes, haue been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the names, number, and length of reigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardicus as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that vary from Eusebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will only here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reignes thus:

Arbaces.	} who reigned	{ 28 50 30 50 22 40 22 20 30 36	} yeeres.
Mandanes.
Sofarmon.
Articarmin.
Arbians.
Artaus.
Artines.
Asybarus , with his sonne Apanda
Apanda alone.
Darius with Cyrus

Didorus Siculus following Ctesius (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Didorus, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Arbaces.	} who reigned	{ 28 50 30 50 22 40 22 40	} yeeres.
Mandanes.
Sofarmus.
Articus.
Arbians.
Arsaus.
Artines.
Artabannus.
Asybara.				} the continuance of these two he doth not mention.
Asyages.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by coniectures founded vpon

Cresus and Metasthenes, I will lay the burden vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medius and Cardicus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardicus were Diodorus his Arbians, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Sosarmus.	30
Medius.	40
Cardicus.	15
Deiaces.	54
Phraortes.	24
Cyaxares.	32
Assyages.	38

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the son of Assyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwile than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Governors of Athens for ten yeeres, that is, of Charops, Asimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, saue that Rome was built in his first yeere; of which perhaps himself did not heare. Of the second and third I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of iustice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed vpon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in vnchastity, caused her to be lockt vp with an Horse, giuing to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Mæonia. Lydius the son of Atys reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleue such authority as we find, This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Aleus the son of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclides continued reigning fifty five yeeres (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the son continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who doated so much vpon the beauty of his owne wife, that he could not be content to enioy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the son of Dasytus, to behold her naked body; & placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderstanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardis reigned nine & forty years; then Sadyattes, twelue; Haliattes, fifty seuen; and finally Crasus, the son of Haliattes, fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crasus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, & Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syraculanes: besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclides that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my self to take notice in the time of their severall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, & the folly of this last king Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Iuda, when Egypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

S. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example prouing this out of William of Tyre his History of the holy warre.

He emulation & quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, do require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Country, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Mæstrie. Of Cham the son of Noah, vho first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings; that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not only forbear to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances prouing them to haue been Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginary ground, wherupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of History doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to beleue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed onely forty two descents; which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, hauing reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to finde names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none so other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning; chasing away Sahar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick king of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalrick made vpon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sahar the former Soldan hoped to make his party good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt.

Briefly,

Briefly, Samar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracoon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Samar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargan's; but hee enjoyed it not: for in few daies after, he was slaine by treason, whereby Samar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great City of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadach gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilst he might haue the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracoon with his Turkes, whom Samar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly go their way home. They seize vpon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more company from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Army, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadach particularly, in his owne Title. Syracoon, Captaine of the Turkes that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (vvho was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Abraham that false Prophet, the Soueraignty ouer all that vvhere of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakenesse of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, vvith the Western parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Eastern Prouinces are vp in Armes, and Syracoon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition do affrighteth King Almaricke, that vvith all his forces he hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Samar the Soldan perceiuing the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victory was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue been King in title only, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Egypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much fouler he tooke vpon him) was subiect to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadach to ratifie the couenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, vvith which all diligence, did reuerence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these straight Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retain the grauity of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things vvich detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all vvrought ouer with embossed vvorkes, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble vvith cleare vvaters, and many sorts of strange birds, vvknown in those parts of the world, as coming perhaps from the East Indies, vvich then was vvndiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueyed them into other Courts within these; as far excellling the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high estate they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, vvho vvrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's own lodgings, vvich were yet more stately, and better guarded, vvhere entering the Presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he vvore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the Captaine, behinde vvich the Caliph sat. Presently the trauerser, vvrought vvith Gold and Pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting vvith great maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing few of his most inward Seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger vvherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almarick, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he vvould thoroughly perform all vvich vvvas promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They vvould haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargain; vvich the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cesarea saw that the Caliph gave his hand, neither vvillingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holste to hide it selfe; Princes, that vvill hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, & sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we vvill make no bargain vvith your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But, when it vvould none otherwise be, vvith a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) he vvouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the couenants vvord by vvord, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, vvith such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, vvwe may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vvexing himself vvith the great preparations made against him, vvich terrifie his neighbour Countreies: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vvying all Royall power; making war and peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forraign Prince. What greater authority vvvas giuen to Ioseph, vvhen Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and as thy word shall all my people be armed, onely in the Kings throne will I be above thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt.

I do not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approoue the coniecture of mine Author, vvhere he thinks, that the Egyptians, euer since Ioseph's time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude vvich hee brought vpon them, vvhen he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good, that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For vvwe finde, that euen the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolemeus Ligi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) vvwere guen, all of them, vvholly to please their own appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures vvich that Countrey afforded, vvwere indeed sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard vvherin the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them security, vvwhereby they might the better trust their Officers, vvith so ample commission. But of this matter, I vvill not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre, vvho lived in the same age; vvvas, in few yeares after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse vvith Hugh Earle of Cesarea, touching all these matters. Vvherefore it remains, that vvwe be not carried away vvith a vaine opinion, to beleue that all they vvwere Kings, vvhom reports of the fabulous Egyptians haue honoured vvith that stile; but rest contented vvith a Catalogue of such, as vvwe finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Countrey; after vvhom it follovvves that vvwe should make enquiry.

S. II.

Of Acherres: whether he were Vchorus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this business I hold it vaine to bee too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree. In this case Annus would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to bee beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osius, Ipsi, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the reigne of Thooris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to euery one the same length of reigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenres, that perished in the Red Sea. This king seemes to Reineccius to be the same, whom Diodorus calls Vchorus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great king, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchorus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaeus (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchorus: for the distance betweene them was more than eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Osymandyas to haue bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wifes, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wifes right. As for Vchorus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ozodorus, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchorus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inexticable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was painted a great Army with the siege of a Town, the capriuities of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue bene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his owne particular monument, struing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statues, therein placed, by the Wars, the indgement state, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuenues, and plenty of all Cattell and Food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the feccall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my workes. Let them that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preferred among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, & this empty Monument might king Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deeds, among the royal sepulchres. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this coniecture, seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his increase of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassaes are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Ioseph & Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to tortise mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchorus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gchoar, Licutenant vnto the Caliph Elcaim; who hauing to his Masters vse conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Calhira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mist: esse, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian stauce.

S. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Ramestes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded, & held the kingdom fiftene years: then reigned Armeus five years, & after him Ramestes, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Ramestes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Argivus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the kingdom of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his brothers fifty sons, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloody sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessell with water.

Thereigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; & Ramestes, Argivus; is more than Reineccius beleuees: he rather takes Armeus to haue bin Myri, or Meru, who caused the great lake to bee made which beares his name. For my own part, as I can easily beleuee, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so do I not find how in so short a reigne, as five years, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wifes being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myri, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose reignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to prouethem of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bond-men, and all their land for bread; of Gchoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reignes, whom wee finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand sixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fifty fadomes deepe. It serued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrey: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fifty talents; but the Lake it self defraied that cost, seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myri gaue to his Wife to buy sweet oymments, and other ornaments for her body. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armeus (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeare and odde months of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Rameses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdome forty years. Some giue him onely nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinks him to haue been the king that was drowned in the Red Sea: wherof I haue already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

Sethosis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, sixty five yeares. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesostris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesostris made, could haue been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceiue, if he looke vpon any Chronological Table, and consider who liued with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynastie of the Larthes, which Reinccius coniectures to haue had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetturia, were called Larthes, (the Hetturians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to haue signified as much as Imperatour, or General. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to haue been against the *Ethiopi*ans: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countie of Palestina, that is, next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled ouer the desert lands, on the other hand; to seek matter of conquest, in the poore Countie of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Romane Emperours were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vulnerable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, & that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only vpon coniecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldane Saladin, murdering the Caliph, got the Souerainty to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, styled Edaiguadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Family was almost as great, as the Soldans own. Yet was there also the Amir Calir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, spend of the Soldans Treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnes of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynastie was called of the Sheepheders, because Isophs gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Ammius his Mandis) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now return to the businesse which we left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, three score and six yeares. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I haue spoken in the first booke. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Rameses, or of Ammenophis and Annenemes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the later sixe and twenty yeares. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thothris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven yeares; yet is he thought to haue bin that Proetus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helen from Paris, and after the sacke of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thothris his reigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This

This Proetus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thoth, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are likeli to haue had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proetus, who detained Helen, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is grown into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Nepheles Seale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Ile of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphus, the Son of Proetus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsisius, & tells a long tale fit to please children, of his courtcoulesse, and how his treasure-houise was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may belecue what he list. How long this king reigned I know not, nor thinke that either he, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus, of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Tamperphobis, of vvhom Suidas deliueis onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, vvhom perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Sanyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that liued vnder him; Zuchyrus, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great iustice; and Thulis, of vvhom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Ile of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or which is all one with Seraphus, desiring to know, who before him had bene, or after him should be so mighty as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plefsus his worke, Of the transse of Christian religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, & much more impertinent in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one, which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
Which three be One, and ioine in One all three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile vviight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excellet thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof, as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, & that clause of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some impudore: but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as vvould seruet to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that he vvvas a man both deuout, & of good iudgement, in matters that fell vvithin his compasse. I will here set down the List of old Egyptian Kings deliueied by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first king of Egypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the son of Chus, was also called Orion, & further tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, & by her three sonnes; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeares, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Inno, his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned only two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visit his blde father Saturne; Saturne forth-with reigned the Kingdome vnto him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie three score and two yeares, had three score and ten vvives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

Ecc

The

The Principall of Iupiters sons, were Faunus, Proculus, and Apollus. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurius; he, reigned in Italia, after his father, five and thirty yeares: and then finding that all his brethren conspired against him, he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Misphus, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty yeares. After Menturius, Kullan reigned in Egypt, foure yeares and a halfe. Then Ses, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twenty yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Sesif, Osiris, Orax, and Thales; Thales was the greatest of Osiris king twenty yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Nabuco; that held the Crowne fifty yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cadrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I find them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certainenes, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might haue beene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius, for it. Those giue vs not the length of his reigne, but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gegar from the Ammonites, & gave it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, what in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princess. In the life of Rehoboam all hath bin written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must haue bin six and twenty yeares, if he were that Swend with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance, this course I take. From the fourth yeare of Ichoiskim, king of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon vponwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first yeare of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twenty sixe of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and died, enioying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than ten the Israelite, & Crausus the Romane did; who after him, spoiled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time between Sesac and Neco, I haue rather taken those kings that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Beechoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue bin a king. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by *Ethiopian*s, which got the kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esaie, that the Counsellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long & flourishing continuance of that house, in somuch, that they said of Pharao, I am the Sonne of the wife, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the reignes of Iosias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all, the reigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting to compare the reignes of the kings of Iuda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, king of Israel, is made to reigne three yeares after Abazia of Iuda; Samarita is taken by Salmassar before Hezekia was king: and in a word, all, or most of the kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere, of their collateralles, than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI. Of

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betwene the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

Following therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemibis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fifty yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom vpwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seven akers euerie way, and was aboute six akers high. It was of a very hard & durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any iniurie that it had suffered by weathen in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeares; which doth giue the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they haue seene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue beene brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue beene son to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty yeares; Cephrenes fifty fixe. These were, as Chemmis had beene builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies, & to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honor, & cruciuling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might be, that they, who had not power to auoid the like slauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother or son, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money, did prostitute her, & that she, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Mycerinus, the son of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father six yeares. He would haue built as his fore-goes did, but preuented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of six yeeres only, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should haue beene afflicted an hundred and fifty yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou liue but six yeeres. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was, doubtlesse, more offended with the institution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happy, than that of Mycerinus, vvhich, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I find in Reimscius fifty yeares assigned to this King, which I verily beleue to haue bin some error of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversightes: for I know no Auth that giues him so many yeares, and Reinecius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice, and may be taken for that Banchyrus, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. yeeres of his reigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Apychis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Apychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne iudgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Apychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blinde man, before the Aethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betwene Bocchorus, and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe yeeres; and so long doth Euclides, so long doth Reinecius hold, that these two kings, between them both did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprouable that the reignes of two kings should haue bin so soone spent, hee may doe it by taking some yeares from Seton or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, must haue bene in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nabuchadnezar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeares onely to these two kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of *Sennacherib*s warre: at which time Seton was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde yeares vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeares, we shall thrust the beginning of Seton out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Egyptian kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Apychis and Anysis out of the roll, which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, & extending his life yet fixe yeares further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reigne) vnto the yeares of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Aethiopian, who tooke the kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Country. Zonaras calls this King Sna; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserue the Israelites from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the reigne of this one king So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reigne began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours: but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that *Sennacherib*s and Isidore compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such a staffe Isidore found it, and such Ezekiel might haue found it; had he not bene supported by the strong staffe of him, that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabshake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Egyptian forces, for Charress and Horfe-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe which So left vnto Seton his Successor, hauing now fulfilled the fiftie yeares of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodore haue both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this king; saying, that he left the Country, & willingly retired into Aethiopia, because because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his kingdome. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their seruants, and invited kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue signified this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuice of the fearefull old man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himselfe into Aethiopia, where he had bene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Aethiopia, into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the king (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my self with such enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeed an Aethiopian (for in histime liued the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but onely so farnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposit. The quiet and milde forme of his government; his holding the kingdome so long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee betooke a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his life and kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Seton his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his hauing bene king.

S. V I I.

Of Seton who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

The first yeare of *Seton*s reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublefome age, and full of danger; the two great kingdomes of Assyria and Egypt, being then engaged in a Warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Assyrian had the better men of Warre; the Egyptian better provision of necessaries: the Assyrian, more Subiects; the Egyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subiects of Assyria, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last fort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so neare and mighty a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet farre removed King. But herein was great difference, between Ezekia and his Subiects: For the good King, fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Country: the multitude of Iudes, looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to feare any more of those iniuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giuing the people of Iuda to vnderstand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that Assyria should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (saide the Prophet) they are vanity, and they shall helpe in vaine, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was giuen to the Jewes, by Seton, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Chariots, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) vnto the holy one of Israel, nor seeke vnto the Lord. But hee yet is wisest.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, & wakened them out of these dreames; for Seton their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did seem farre off, being vnready, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seem that he purposed, rather to make Palestina than Egypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca, all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in fore distresse, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Affsyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninuce, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Seton their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him & their Country, that Seton being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Seton, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, & the like) marched towards Pelafium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the bowes, quiuers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hercof (saith Herodotus) the statue of his King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that holds me serue God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how farr they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Seton was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the vworld, whereof euery childe could haue told, how much falshood had bene mingled with the truth.

We find this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib king of the Affsyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Seton were a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue bin slaine, if a mercifull king had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stir vp the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expresseing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means vvhich came, no man knew from violence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly king, was indeede a very good moode to pietie. But the Embleme, together vvhith the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne vvhether this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be roobed of his honour. Yet that we may not bellie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Seton finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes teuen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie (I would haue bin ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Charets of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horsemen, because they were very strong; had it bin told them, that Seton, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good lucke, or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse the propheticke of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor do them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Seton to haue bin set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Seton. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a king of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war last spoken of; the Ethiopians (as they are englished) ouer which he reigned, being indeede Chasites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tirhaca, is placed in the roome of Seton, and therefore giue to Seton the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his Reigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Seton.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Seton reigned; Funilius preposterously, citing no author, nor alleadging reason for it, lets him down thirty three yeeres; many omit him quite, and they that name him, are not careful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the first of Rehoabam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be consigned vpon him whose length of reigne is vncertaine; that is, vpon this Seton. By this accompt I find the thirty three yeeres, that are set downe by Funilius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Setons reigne; therefore I conforme my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeare lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and wherinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which it is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasses and his Contemporaries.

S. I.

The wickednesse of Manasses. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death

MANASSE, the Son of Ezekia, forgetting the pietie of his Father and the prosperitie which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Diuell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sons for a Sacrifice to the Diuell Moloch, or Melchior, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Diuels.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied & maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged & reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the kings race, & as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieth yeere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous & monstrous than hath bene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hercof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captaines of the Hosts of the Kings of Assur, which tooke Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty yeeres as a captiue, and dispoyle of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall tinuall prayer, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie and estate. After vvhich, and when he was againe established, remembreing the miseries vvhich followed his vickednesse, & Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuilish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, & sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie five yeares. Glycus and Suides report, that Manasse vvas held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleue as it shall please their fancies,

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasse vvas the cause of the cuill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect boine to his owne ends) desirous to enlarge his Empire, to make attempt vpon Juda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissention, & after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raigne of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Ariflocratie, or twelue Gouernors, immediately before Psammiticus, vvho vvas one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seemes to haue bin the vn certainty of title to that Kingdome: for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I haue often shewed; which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignty.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preferue, they made strait couenant & alliances one with another, being iealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vntie lasted, they ioyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built nere vnto the Lake of Meris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could giue it commendation answerable to the stateliness of the worke it self. I will not here set downe that vsuall description, which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say, that he prefers it faire before the Pyramids, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue bin the worke of Marus, or Menides, a king which liued five generations before Protus, that is, before the Waire of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue bin Ananemes, which reigned immediately before Thooris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Ananemes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amnophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Atifanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had coniectured Manethon Amnophis, to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Atifanes, and that Ananemes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a coniecture; the times which we now handle are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amfis, Atifanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Atifanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Amfis; Atifanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders; so likewise vvas Sabacus; Marus the next king after Atifanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiug Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauiug not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleueed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Hals, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cuppes. Hereupon Psammiticus, vvho standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet; and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being iealous of their estate, they banished him into the marsh Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the cuent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleue to haue bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeares to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling, ioynly with the Princes before spoken of. Indee, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to haue bene then a young fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernors, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreame age; if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, thre score & nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius, but will not adventure to cut five yeares from the Ariflocratie: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed and was ten yeares companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of the Egyptians, as we find them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, between the first of Rehoboam, & the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethon's reigne; that was of vn certaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Funellius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe allcadgeth, in giuing to Sethon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one reigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many yeeres as are prescribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplied the defect of anothers. Whicfore I confound the last yeare of those fifteene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; vvho surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, & make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, vvho entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, vvhist his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messiges, nor by the King himselfe, vvho ouer-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becus, Becus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Beker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his workes, may find enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs vsed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talke, one knew what.

But I will not insist vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palastina, about which he spent nine and twenty yeeres. Neuer haue we heard (aith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had bene won by Tartan, a Captaine of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

Here it certainly knowne, in what yeere of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained libertie; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to haue bene no small occasion, both of his Captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill vvarres in Egypt that followed vpon the death of Setson; or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the vvarre betwene Psammiticus and his Collogues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria; and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Arme into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure vvorke vwith the King of Juda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, vvinne his Country, but onely vvasse it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned vvit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Leuzai, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, vvhetherby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; vvhether by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner, or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, & Iosephus giues no information. Yet I find cited by Tornielius three opinions, the one of Ballarmine, vwho thinke that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, vwho affirms, that it was in his twentieth seuenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, vwho saith, that he was fortie yeeres an Idolater, and lined fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these coniectures is vpheld by Tornielius, vwho reiects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Tornielius in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinal, as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gaue his iudgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Ballarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is like that he should haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill he was thirtie yeeres from death. Touching the second; howsoeuer it be a full thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two & fiftie yeeres, shall be punished with small penitency. But against these two collections of Tornielius, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse, than Ballarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the cuill which Manasses did, is remembered at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life; the story of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that hee did, and his sinne that hee finished, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the kings of Juda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities vvhich that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-child of these Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this vpon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sinnes of Manasses; according to all that hee did, and for the innocent blood that hee shed; for hee filled Ierusalem with innocent blood; therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers vvell these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteen yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seuen yeere old, he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of ciuill dissension in Egypt, foureteeen or fifteen yeeres following, wherein that kingdom was weakened, by partition of the Souerainty: the vvarre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twenty yeeres, of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all vwithin the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the first fifteen yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Country. All vvhich I will adde hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses, was the last yeere of Setson in Egypt, and the one, and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seuen and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the sixt of Nabulassar, the son of Merodach, in Babylon: but vvhich of these was the yeere of his imprisonment, or vvhether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer-violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great mastrie that the Babylonians had of the kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Sennacherib enterprife against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of siluer, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which coured the doores, and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessity, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among vvhich it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of seruitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilest they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had bene against all reason reason and policie, if it had not bin his duty by couenant. Of this I will speake more in convenient place.

6. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekia, and Manasses, Kings of Iuda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Warres, which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Persian Wars, deserue not to be passed ouer with silence.

The first Messenian Warre began and ended in the dayes of Ezekia; the second in the reign of Manasses: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our History, I haue thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the Acheans out of their seats, diuided their lands between themselves, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Messene, & Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloody Wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance, they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedæmonians were so transported, that any thing serued them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polycharus a Messenian had laine many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to haue him yielded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polycharus, for that he was grown franticke, through iniuries received from Euphones a Lacedæmonian. This Euphones had bargained to giue pasture to the Cattell of Polycharus, & was therforeto receiue part of the increase; but not contented with the gaine appointed, he sold the Cattails, and slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receiue, he carried the Son of Polycharus home with him; but hauing him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians hauing refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Theefe & Murderer, ought not to picke matter of quarrel, out of those things, which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the iudgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupie the faire Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old iniuries, & so without sending any defiance, secretly tooke an oath to hold warre with Messene, till they had mastered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphisa, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hercupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and vvere met by the Enemye. A furious battaile was fought between them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victory. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedæmonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the foureteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twenty yeares. The two enemye Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians waisting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argiues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subiects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third and fourth battaile, were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; sauing that in the fourth battaile the Lacedæmonians were enforced ced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still vncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphones their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeares were spent ere all this blood was shed, for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a towne vpon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their vow; that hauing absented themselves ten yeares from Sparta, their wiues sent them word, that their City would grow vinepeopled, by reason that no children had been borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent backe all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with childe, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in proceesse of this Messenian Warre, when the Deuill in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stocke of Egyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciscus; Epibolus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, she was onely a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwise he could not preuaile, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defouled her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of preuailling against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace, which they obtained in most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearly fruits of their land they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their wiues, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they were also sworne to lue in true subiection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was giuen to the Asinaei, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty yeares it continued: the Messenians not finding how to helpe themselves, and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorned to serue such Masters, as had 40 against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman, of the house of Egyptus; who perceiving the vniforme desires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argiues & Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought between them, & a doubtfull; saue that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud 50 Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King; but hee, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argiues, Arcadians, & Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloody fight; but Aristomenes did, so behaue himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrans an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-enforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Arisfomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him in hope to haue recovered the booty.

But all these victories of Arisfomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vpon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Arisfocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butchery. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principall Citie, all the townes of Messene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, & the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conueyed into a place of safety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleauen yeares. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Arisfomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. Hee wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattell, and all provisions, necessary for his owne people; the Slaues and household stuffe he changed into money, suffering the owners to redeme them. To remedy this mischiefe the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adioyning parts of their owne Country, should be tilld or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrans appeared this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Arisfomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Towns, surpris'd, and sackt Amyclæ, & finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Arisfomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escap'd. One escape of his seruices to be remembered, as a thing very strange and maruailous. He had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vpon his back, and carried away prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deepe natural Cauer into which the Spartans vs'd to cast head-long, such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Arisfomenes and his companions adiudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fals; Arisfomenes (howsoeuer it came to passe) took no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceiued by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead body. Hercupon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ran through an hole at which came in a little light; and there did Arisfomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Arisfomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was requiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleueed, that Arisfomenes was aloue indeed.

Thus eleuen yeares passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Arisfomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asked him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Arisfomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad, neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke rainie night as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreame darknesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by meere hope of ending a long worke, the other enraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streetes and other passages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toyle; their Enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meate and sleepe, and then returning supplied the place of their weay fellowes with fresh Companions. Arisfomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing bene three dayes, and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arriued safe in Arcadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to rescue; but Arisfocrates their false-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Arisfomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out fiftie hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste vnto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne secure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprize, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Arisfocrates marr'd all, by sending speedy aduertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Arisfocrates, was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falshood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note: That the Periuier cannot deceiue God.

Of Arisfomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his Son Gorgus & other sufficient Gouvernours, who should plant them in some new leare abroad, he resolved himselfe to make aboad in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honorably in marriage. One of them Demagetis, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally, Arisfomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purposed to haue traauelled vnto Araps the Sonne of Ogyes King of Lydia, & to Phraortes King of Media; but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian, and went into Italy after the former warre) being Lord of the Rhegiens in Italy, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicily, on the other side of the Streights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeare of the twenty eight Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home serued the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Countreymen into Italy and Sicily, some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a feate.

It is very strange, that during two hundred & fourescore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, & loue of their forsaken Country, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third year of the hundred & second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, & help them in building a faire City, which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

S. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned, whether Deioeces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Iudith. Of the historie of Iudith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding vnto his father Gyges, began his reigne of nine and forty yeares, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus & Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, & assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, ouerran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driuen out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but wan the City of Sardes; though the Cattle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys, whose long reigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six yeares after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last yeare of Manasses his reigne ouer Iuda.

Deioeces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these five & fifty yeares in which Manasses reigned. This Deioeces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the whole some severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioeces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gave audience, when also when he did, it was with such austerity; that no man durst presume to speeche or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiesty, which his predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betwene this king, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliueris, that Deioeces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the story of Iudith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holofernes sent to worke wonders vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioeces to haue beene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this booke of Iudith to a certain time, there hath much labour been spent with ill successe. The reignes of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue beene sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: & now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue beene thought vpon; and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as fauour would) agree with him. Whilest Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the story of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue beene very fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, & who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this History; and about all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose iudgement the authority of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reigne of his vaine-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a returne from captivity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Iosachim High Priest; & a long peace of threescore and ten yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that reigned in Nineue, eightene yeares at the least; that vanquished & slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to assist; one that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Vice-roy, or Capitaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Iosachim, with a returne from Captiuitie; are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, & desolation of the City. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonically. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and rededified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioeces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds, that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to haue beene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Army which he sent forth vnto Holofernes. So should the Iewes haue done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also, the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iury were agreeable to the History of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Iewes, & as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Historicks, takes away beliefe from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a Rebelle, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seuentene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himselfe. It is indeede easie to finde enough that might be said against this deuce of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity of holding the booke of Iudith, to be Canonically, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Historicks, and build some defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments. That she liued not in the Reigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chadonofor, found out by Tornielus, are the children of meere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needes no prooffe at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which haue contended about the time of this History, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stormy field) haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer known.

Iudith c. 1. ver. 23. & 25. Surely, to finde out the borders of Iapheth, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabia; or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Reigne.

Of other Princes and actions that were in thesetimes.

THE first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeare the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen; a peaceable man and seeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good ciuility, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romanes as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better than meere delusions that serued onely as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of theues and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, than their boisterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Books that were found in his graue, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the son of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions seuen, and other seuen of Philosophy. They were not only vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the City desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe vnto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to beleue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poison wherewith he had infected Rome, when hee sat in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the misse of ignorance was somewhat better discuffed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generally) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confusion, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inueterate.

Numa reigned three and forty yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the fixe and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirty yeares, busied for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thufcanes, caused them to bethinke themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins borne at one birth (Dionysius saies that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their seuerall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romanes got the victory, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Linie tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, hee slue them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could ioine together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slaine, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly seuer the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become subiect vnto her owne Colony, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, & diuers petty States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of fundry ages, & few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, shall grow to be the main subiect of this History.

The seuenth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Gouernours for ten yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kingtime. Of these I finde only names, Leocrates, Abfander, and Erizias. After Erizias 30 yearly Rulers were elected.

These Gouernours for ten yeares, were also of the race of Medon and Cadmus; but their time of rule was shortned, & from terme of life reduced vnto ten yeares; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue private men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeares of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall Table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not only professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeares of the Greeks, how they did answer vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first 40 yeare of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeare of Charops gouernment of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who lesse the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reigne of Manasses it was, that Midax, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asses eares, held the kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meane he had like to haue bene starved (his meate and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from this miserable faculty, by causing him to wash himselfe in the River Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtained some power by Sea, founded Macieratis a City on the East of Egypt. Psammetichus herein seems to haue assisted them, who vsed all meanes of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, & banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justin and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet living, the city Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the region of the Umbri, now Urbino in Italy. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were vpbraid as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosporus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to haue bin done in the sixe and fifty yeares of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, refering only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

2 Chron. 33.

2 Chron. 34.

Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conuersion, rettored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after he had reigned two yeares. Philo, Eusebius, and Nicephorus giue him ten yeares, following the Septuagint.

Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a childe of 8 yeares old, he began to seek after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places; and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim. He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stamp to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophesied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be born vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee: a prophecy very remarkable.

1 Kings 13.

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which¹⁰ time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuerer commandments therein written, the prosperity promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euem all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue forfaken mee, and burnt incense to other gods. Only for the king himselfe, because he was a louer of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his daies, but that he himselfe should inherit his graue in peace.

2 Kings 22. 17.
2 Chron. 34.

Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Benjamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and Commandments in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries, that had beene part of the kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victory of Iosias in warre got possession of these places, but rather that Ezekias, after the sight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vnder the advantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himself vnable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twenty yeares) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amity that the kings of Iuda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with adition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Iewes, which had been lost by iniuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda, it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleeue, that he, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he trauelled in making such provisions, only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the king of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requital. For no persuasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Neco king of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeare of Iosias his reigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Iudea, determining to passe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Cerecissum, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done), or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the trouaile of Psammiticus had not been idly consumed about that one Towne of Ainim, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damascus.

2 Chron. 35. 20.

Neither was the indolence of Neco lesse than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, & advanced their affaires & hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it selfe could afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feeble it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Army.

The two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territory set in the mid-way between both, so as the one could not invade the other; but that they must of necessity tread vpon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadours,

leauē to passe along by Iudæa, protesting that he directed himselfe against the Assyrians only, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Ioseph the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus, or Sous King of Egypt, was vterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life & estate, which the Assyrian so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeares of Ezekias, whilst that good king and his people relied vpon Serbon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbors though they were) were alwaies vnready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craued that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp only by a polittick respects, to stop the way of Neco, but thought himself bound in faith & honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; wherunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their Enemy.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrary to the aduice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecy of Jeremy, nor can finde reason to beleue. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might beleue that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelity and thankfulness due to the king of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednes of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength he could make neare vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco: and there he receiued the stroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the People and Princes of Iuda, especially of Jeremy the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Iosias: Of Ichoahaz and Ichoiakim Kings of Israel.

Of these warres, and particularly of this victory, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should haue reached about an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middle of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toyle some businesse twelue hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet,

and leaued a great Army, wherewith he marched against the king of Babel. In this expedition he vied the seruice, as well of his Nauy, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, save only this victory against Iosias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolis, and the Iewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudæa was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolis or Magdala is taken to haue bin the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Neco tooke the City of Cadytis, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subiects, & that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulf of Arabia, & so passing along all the Coast, whercon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance; in that long voyage which lasted three yeares. This was the first Nauigation about Africa, wherem that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, vntil Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars & streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gybraltar, hauing Afrique still on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same streights, leaued Afrique on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not beleue, how the Sun in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth; & the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleue, that such a voyage was indeed performed.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were busie at Charchemish, had made Iehoshaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Reigne of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Iehoshaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Iosias: Wherefore it may seem that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the sequele. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his busines in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudæa. This Country was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappy to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may be observed in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, since hee could no better vse it. But how-euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributary, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stout to giue him peace, when hee desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waste his forces vpon Iudæa: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Charchemish, together with the dissension of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue storned at the preferment of his younger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen of necessity to forsake that party, and to ioyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people as would not vpon euery occasion shift side, but endure more, than *Pharao*h, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheless he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so hee might both reape at the present some fruit of his paines taken, and leauē vnto them some document in the future, of greater greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate king Iehoaabaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The reigne of Iehoaabaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his succellour, did reigne ten whole yeares, whereas the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to be vnworthy of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impiety was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as ¹⁰ hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done, makes it apparant, that the poyslon wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnes ^{2 Chron. 36. 14.} of Iosias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Ten vnto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royall authority was much abused by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this trouble-some age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings beare to profess, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell, as we finde by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe appeare to haue been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods iudgements against the City and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrary to the custome vsed, both in those daies, & since among all ciuill Nations, of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge. ³⁰

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Iehoiakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeares, began about these times, to roare so loud vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the houle of Merodach, from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media, How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the sonne of Baladan, who taking the aduentage that Sennacherib's misadventure and death, together with the disention betweene his children presented, made himselfe king of Babylon, was eleuen yeares troubled with a powerfull Enemy Asa haddon the sonne of Sennacherib, reigning ouer the Assyrians in Nineue; from whom whilst he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekias, some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Isarhaddon did not only set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reigne following, & his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establisshing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Nineue it selfe, which we may beleue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great City was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation: and and refused afterwards to continue subiect, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner; but I rather beleue those that hold the contrary, for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I finde little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Lewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psummaticus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his son.

Ben Merodach the son and succellour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Reigne is gathered by inference to haue beene one and twenty yeares; for so much remaineth of the time that passed betwene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes: which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeares of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner, and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Psummaticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greeces, did much preuaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alledg'd before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his owne Kingdome; than would permit him to looke abroad: inso much as it may be thought to haue been a great negligence or ouer-sight of Psummiticus and Necop, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Nineue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoue by the coming of the Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the world, laying hold vpon all that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is conuenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire possibility of making himselfe Lord of Nineue.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) hauing been a Soueraigne Lady, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe she was well enough. ^{Herod. l. 1.}

This makes it plain, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subiect as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the means to set it selfe at liberty: as after this againe he did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharpe warre, and the very nouelty of suddaine violence, vs'd to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Nineue had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the fury, wherewith either Domesticall tumults between the sons of Sennacherib, or forreigne war of the Babylo-nians, could afflict it: and therefore is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his iourney against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumstances; perhaps he vnderuallued their forces; and brought a lesse power than was needfull. It is enough, that herein we may beleue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of war than his Father, wan as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; hee fought reuenge vpon the Assyrians for the death of his father; & besieged Nineue it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleue Babylus, that hee tooke the City, and fulfilled his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came vpon him whilst hee lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Babylus, though far later than Herodotus, yet showing seen other Authors that are now lost it is to be valued according to his great reading more do) hold it best to yeeld vnto the best likelihood.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineue, were to accuse him of great imprudence; than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leaue the Towne; when a Warre so dangerous fell vpon his owne Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times, of which booke whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophesie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine terme, yet it appears to haue taken effect, in the final destruction of Nineue by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessity, to affirme, that about these times, Nineue was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory ouer it to Ben Merodach: a needlesse coniecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach, did seize vpon it, & place a King or Vice-roy therein, about such time as the Country of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Nineuites were allayed, & their malice to Babylon so much allwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this vnthankfull People and their King rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty yeeres.

¶ I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue shewed what impediment was giuen by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes & Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble-dounded cūen to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them; for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to be too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty yeeres, he saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Country from them. Yet hee reports a warre betwene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineue; the siege of Nineue being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his forty yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammiticus the sonne of Phrao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammiticus may, by some strained coniecture, be thought to haue bene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued with with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psammiticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaues dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye vpon Herodotus, in this matter, other wise than to belecue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessary, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall History; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neare to vniformity.

I haue noted before, that in the reigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the vpper hand of them. In the times therefore of Ardis, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to haue the eight and twenty yeeres, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twenty yeeres compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could be driuen quite away. To increase this difficulty, the vntoward Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible; that he should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Egyptians and Iewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mighty Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troops, that infected their seuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty yeeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassar's Reigne, in compass whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

¶ II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Tournie.

Touching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not contented with hauing won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ransacked. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose re-flow did ouerwhelm no small portion of Greece & Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their original and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amconica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his workes, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we finde it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neare vnto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse; certain it is that he would haue them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his works the names of such as liued in his owne time, making full mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deferred. And for this reason it is proued by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country, Perhaps that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, wherof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons & the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in expresse termes written, that they did with ioynt-forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue bene wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbonds; alledging the example of that Queen who is said to haue slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wiues along with them to the Warres; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Romane ouerthrew them, giues prooffe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will giue me better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Geoponius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neare allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue bene none other than the sending a Colony of them forth into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seate, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journey. For the City of Nouograd in Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way home-wards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made fife hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maeotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Army about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer many Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue settled themselves in Italy, they diuided their Company, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessity enforced these poore Nations to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitfull of men, than of sustenance, and shut vp on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouer-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of possession, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gaue them great advantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

The first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leauing on the other side, & behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whercon Sinope, a famous Har- Herod. lib. 4. uen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnseruiceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vtmost hazzard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leauing them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neare vnto Gaule, vpon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountains, or any deep Riuers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed.

What battels were fought between these inuaders and the Lydians, & with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to coniecture. This I finde, that in the time of Arads, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capitall City of Lydia, only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Arads Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halysates and Cresus in the times following; all that Arads did against the Cimmerians, & all, saue burning the Milesians Corne fields, that was done in twelue years by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands full of this businesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are neuer so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seats, labour to root out the established possessor of another Land, making room for themselves, their wiues and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements; which had they bene yeilded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring fo little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diuersity of Conquests; hauing by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian bloud) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the higher Asia, did arriue vnto. So that by considering the proesse of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia, whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may haue hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seemes to haue done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians & Halyattes, that the Riuer of Halys should diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the Riuer was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whose wiues and daughteris these warlike women are supposed to haue been.

Herod. lib. 1.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing betweene Halyattes and Cyanaxes the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, vpon whom the Median sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should haue ioyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre betweene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and lesse probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came vnto Cyanaxes; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to bee instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archery. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians vsing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neuertheless other-whiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented vnto him; which done, they fledde vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliueis, as the ground of a Warre that lasted sixe yeares between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyanaxes, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Countri-men that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that we should speake.

T. IV.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course westerly, along the shores of the Euxine sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and hauing the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, & other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Sernan and Georgia, & so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixth yeare of Nabulassars Reigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue reigned sixe & thirty, otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeares of their Dominion end, one yeare before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to provide securely for the invasion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet liued, as Iosephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the sword, refused not to vnder-

goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding till the Countries pleasant & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more trouble would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; & being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was neare enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassars made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the midst between Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary, wherefore we may very well beleue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers, and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the iealous Husband of a faire Wife) took care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion that he could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Army that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not been ill spent in suiting all. Yet Psammiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina: whence he neuer advanced to meete with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to seele as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beate vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he aslay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammiticus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill haue endured to pursue him through vnkowne waies, had they fought with him and preailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that he preferred his owne Estate from a dangerous aduerture, by hyring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the processe of his was in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than cuer troubled themselves with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to seece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to linc at discretion vpon the Country, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers, otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancy, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at once, leaving few alme, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Country not farre from their own home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyanaxes King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanned and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to proue what might be done by

stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus deliuered in brieue; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countymen, with greater cruelty than euer they had practised before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I do not find, neither do I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuasion from Scythia in time following.

Herod. lib. 4.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very strong, & encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Country, tooke good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty years had so well ferled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country; many (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other Prouinces among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to haue bin with Nabuchadnezzar, it may to be vnderstood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subiect vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectually, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accustomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: & this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Her. 2. §. 9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Story, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kinned and friends, in acquiring a new seat, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaues. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of slaues, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleue that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I finde it in Maister Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstood by the way, that their *Challopoy, or Bond-slaues, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, wiues, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villany of their seruants, they made the more speede home: and so not farre from Nouograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. whereupon aduising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set vpon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which, as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and labring all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onset: which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such asense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Druiers. In memory of this villory, the Nouogradians euer since haue stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingko Nouogradskoy, currant through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip & loss in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Country haue feared the worse euer since, in regard of their vniuersall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subiection; being well* well assured to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Nouograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their wiues; which afterwards, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition, not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to haue been a great cause of the Egyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudaea, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes lining in diuers Countries, in these ages.

HAuing thus far digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of mark, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeare of Iulius; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeares. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeare of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty yeares. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeare of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedaemonians belinking them how to beaueged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, & gouerned it in peace thirty yeares, leauing for succour his sonne Periander, one of the leauen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant, who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, & afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparelle, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisdome of the Greeces was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could be admired as excellent all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus & Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soone abrogated, & power giuen to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one bond-woman attending on her, vntill she were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vntill she were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe vp in immodest brauery; vntill she were to inuigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire, for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not henceforth neede so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greeces; the Greeces, with the Romans; the Romans with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirtene hundred yeares, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, wee finde little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neare borders. Yet read we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neare distance, all which must have bene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a very vnseasonable rehearsal, had they not bene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Iudaea, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to returne to the Iewish Story, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third year of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entered Iudaea with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly, for Necho hastened to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Iudaea; where in this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazzard himselfe and his Army, it being a Country of an euill affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Army; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Country, into places that were more euill and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new year came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying vpon the Bank Euphrates (his owne Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a resolu'd contention for victory, Necho was slaine, and his Army remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recouered all Syria, and whatsoeuer the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole referu'dnesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammetichus, who succeeded vnto Necho, began to thinke vpon restoring Iehoaiaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp as a Domestickall Enemy, against his vngratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Iudean had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but eight yeares old. As for this rumour of Iehoaiaz his returne, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should proue idle, saying: He shall not returne thither, but he shall dye in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeede, hauing spent all their Mercenary forces, and receiued that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammetichus, who reigning after Psammetichus, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge look, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazzard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with braue words, telling such frivollous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing, vse of their glorious acts fore-past, against Iosias and Iehoaiaz. In this case it was easie for Iehoiakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subiect, and pay him Tribute: adding herunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudean lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So he continued in the the obedience of Nabuchodonosor for three yeares. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seauenty yeares. The same calamity he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, & the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forsaken, and after the seauenty yeares expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be vnterly subuerted by the Medes, and the Iudans permitted to returne againe into their owne Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seemes to haue been in the fourth year of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to reade them vnto the People, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had first set Jeremy at liberty, and aduised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therin deliuered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition: that the dead body of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, & in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; & vpon iust confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seauenty yeares was prescribed vnto the desolation, as wel of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, & other towns and countries; it is apparant, that they which referred the expugnation of this City vnto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, haue full authority for their warrant. Wherevpon likewise it follows of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seauenth of his Reigne, as hauing lasted thirteen yeares.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note concerning the seuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, wherevpon hath risen much disputation. The third year of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince his sonne, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar, which Jeremy affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time & actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I finde, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seauenth of his Reigne.

The City of Tyre couered all the ground of an Island; that was diuided from the maine, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, & skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euery winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither forced nor famine could greatly hurt the place, whereof neuertheless the iudgements of God denounced against it by Esaie, Jeremy, Ezekiel, & Jeremy had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vndertook a vast piece of worke, even to fill up the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyre, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountain of Libanus near adioyning that was laden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen yeares were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosors Piers; and being being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seaven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where-with Alexander laboured to ouer a shelve; with much more violence could it ouerturn, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deep; struuing as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vfe, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, & adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleased him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vfe the hand of man; euen the hand of man struuing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue over till he was master of the Towne.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice, whether it were so, that some losses recieued, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely, and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious runnours of the Egyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Zedechiam renounced his subiection, & began to hope for the contrary, of that which quickly fell on him. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt; but with part of his Army marched directly into Iudaea, where the amazed king made so little resistance, the Egyptians hauing left him as it were in a dream; that he entred Ierusalem, & layed hands on Zedechiam: whom he first bound & determined to lend to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be staine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be dispoised by beastes and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Zedechiam or Zedechias his sonne; whom, after three moneths and ten daies, Nabuchodonosor removed and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Seraiah, and Iehoiachin the high Priest. And the mother of Zedechias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all able men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captiues. This Zedechias, following the counsell of Ieremy the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; so, though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather than the greater euill that he there by auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers fautes, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserue his Estate: for so we read in general words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his Reade Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Vncle in the kingdom of Iuda, & called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco king of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehoiachin, after his Father Ishon was slaine, and set up Iehoiachin the son of another mother, so Nabuchodonosor slew Zedechiam, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Zedechias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Zedechias, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witnesse it the same, that he would remaine assured to the kings of Chaldaea.

In the fifth yeare of Zedechias, Ieremy saw and expounded the Vision of the epipe and pomegranate, the one signifying those Iudians that were carried away captiue, the other those that stayed and were destroyed. In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremy wrote in a booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which vpon the first of the month of the fourth, when he went with the king Zedechias to Babel, so vnder Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to read to the Captiue Jewes, and then to bide it to a Queene, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be druncke, and shall be vile: from hence shall it fall, and bring vpon her. This Ieremy, I suppose, I should haue better, in way of distinction, carry vnder another name. But I must thinke, that he had compained there to Iake: which his Lordly Majesty refused to grante, and sent him away discontented. For his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him to sit forth as those who quiet courses, from which Ieremy shunned both him and about. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent vnto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they & the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their own Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also fore-told them, that those Vessels, which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also traile after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine, which Ieremy wore, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremy in stead of his wooden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his Reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aides of the Egyptians in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himselfe; but being considered of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should be extirpate, vntill the coming of Sile (according to the prophecy of Iacob) he despised the words of Ieremy, and imprisoned him. For Ieremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carryed to Babel, die his natural death.

Ierusalem, being the following yeare, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Army; the King of Egypt, Pharaoh Hophra, according to Ieremy (Herodotus callth him Apries) entred the border of Iuda, with his Army, to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremy gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Ierusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poore people of Ierusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremity, had manumifed their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yeare of Jubile) and made them free thereof by the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them performe to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremy, when the State of Ierusalem began now to grow to extremity; counsellled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safety of the City, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and periury, had provided for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus eighteen, the Babylonian Army lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. They built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turres ligneas per circuitum: They surrounded the City with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fallly out, nor receiue into the City any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they over-topped the Walls, with high Towres raised vpon Mounts; from which they did beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found means to ouer-throw all the Citizens endeavours, and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men streightly besieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, whenthe humbled strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did feat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate! Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the City, by a way vnder ground, leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the mercuriall swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, vied now that remedy, which Wolfius truly tearmeth: Triste, turpe & infelix. Wofull, blamefull, and vnprofitable.

1. 10. c. 11.*

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Defarts of Iericho: but by reason of the train, that followed him, and his, every one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them, he was easily traced and pursued. How great fouer the company was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Defarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance, by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a City (as some thinke) of Nephelaim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent betwene Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at one he had to doe.

Ezek. 12.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layed before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable fallshood and periury, wherewith he had requited them, he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer the world beheld in the World, he caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him a doulfull matter to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most maruailous Prophecy of Ezekiel was performed: Adhuc cum in Babyloniis, & ipsam non videret. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleauenth and last yeare of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the yeare next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seuenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood foure hundred thirty and one yeares.

2 Kings 25.

After this, with a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Gouernour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equity, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias in it Remeth, in the beginning of the Warre: and by Jeremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonians; who being ordained by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godolia, to whom he was recommended, who not only embraced Jeremy, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes, that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour & liberty, so long as they remained obedient Subiects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provinciall Gouernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godolia feasted them in Maspha or Mispha, the City of his residence, trayterously slew him, together with diuers Chaldeans & Iewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godolia with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discouer vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godolia by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discouered vnto Godolia by Iobanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Iewes; but Godolia was incredulous.

Iudea being now left without a Gouernour (for Ismael durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Iewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flye away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Iudea, God would prouide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to saue themselves in Egypt, that they should then vndoubtedly perish. Nowwithstanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they trauailed into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neare vnto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his owne hard-hearted and vngratefull Countrey-men, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuenced him, buried neare the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betwene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

S. I.

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

HE course of Time; which in profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, & in the Easterne Countries by the account from Nabonassar, left surer marks, & more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the war of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the attunes of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their owne. Having therefore pursued the story of the World vnto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means & circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metalls, discovered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insit vpon those authorities, which giue as it were by heare-say, a certaine year of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, wherof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus & his issue that occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye vpon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony, which some haue found in the years of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preiudice their names which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Iehojakim and Zedekias. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired, and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords vs means of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeare of Cyrus his reigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeare of the 55. Olympiads, where, that he reigned three and twenty yeares before his Monarchy, and seuen yeares afterwards, it is apparant, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeares vnto the distance betweene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus, we may easily arrive vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from aubors of wel-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeares of the world, through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe 30 so our selves truely of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

A briefe rehearsal of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the cauals of Porphyrie, inuighing against S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde that the captiuitie then began, when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, 11. yeares before the final destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabucaradan, in these words: In the five and twentieth yeere of our being in Captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth yeere after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleven yeares before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Iakim, which he endeauours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but seeme not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue mislittered occasion of scoffing & railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderstanding how the sons of King Iosias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and ar, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the secenty Interpreters, who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeares before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who liued diuers yeares before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him; which not onely stayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

It is true indeed that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authority to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say *Esdra*s and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane fo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by *Esdra*s and the Seniors; we may assure our selues by testimony of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Iovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty yeares, this booke of Daniel was receiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonically Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Councell it may be seene, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history, the fourth booke, and fise and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonically books vpon Origens: so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregory Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiographa booke or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbins reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Psalms, Præterius, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Heister, Efra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this booke, Gods commandment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimony. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Mark allcageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeeres of captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of Technia.

HAuing thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weaknesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beralius; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Inda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses, then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, technia, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I haue read; to the second, by few and with weak prooffe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Ieremy, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with technia, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremy had already, in the fourth year of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the finnes and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: *Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the Bridegroom, and the voyce of the Bride, the voyce of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle; and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the king of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the king of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophecy was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of technia; but with the vtter desolation of the City, whereof Ieremy did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Inda, where it is said thus: *They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carryed he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremia, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the dayes that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the 30. first yeere of Cyrus king of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremia, was fulfilled) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldome finde one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to haue afterwards been the subiect of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could haue been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecy haue been more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in to euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, vnto this expedition of Ieremia his prophecy, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been promised by prayer, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by books the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord hath spoken vnto Ieremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that howsoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie be reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with technia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeares of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of secenty yeeres.

This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authority of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

What Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy yeares of the Captiuitie, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reigns, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Maiesty, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Affyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardy piece of worke, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by ioyning vnto it the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuinding it from the maine with a mole, or peece of earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bowes would carry, but were ready to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their feuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, wee may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three stothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children liuing in the Egyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeares, not only by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Affyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeares of their feuerall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerey follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Eulmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they onely the silence of Daniel, who names none other to bee their warrant, but the prophecy of Ieremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very fame. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the king of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, vntill the very time of his Land come: also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serue themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessity of qualification to be vsed herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the content of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofes of their different reports are so slender & vninsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but only set down by some some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well haue found and deserued as good belief, as any of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeares; to Eulmerodach 18. to Niglsar the sonne of Eulmerodach 40. to Labofardach the sonne of Niglsar 9. Moneths, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (saue that hee forbears to reckon the yeares, and plainly calls Balthasar the sonne of Labofardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus and Iosephus as a sectator of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells vs that Eulmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did reigne but two yeares, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nizigissoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeares, and left it to his owne sonne Labofardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeares, or of generations, yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authority, so that the names which they haue inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Eulmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleue Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate successor to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betwene him that rooke Ierusalem, and Eulmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any History sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius Severus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground haue supposed, that Eulmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Eulmerodach there is none that euery doubt) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremy before cited, proues that Balthasar was not the sonne indeed, but the grand childe of that great Conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Easterne languages, he was called the son.

Annius his Metaphyses hits very rightly the seventy yeares of captiuitie, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45. yeares, to Eulmerodach 30. yeares, and to the three sonnes of Eulmerodach, Nepheus of Nabuchodonosor fourteene yeares; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son three yeares, to Lab-Assar the second sonne sixe yeares, and to Balthasar the third son five.

As to this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of yeares; and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, haue consented with this Metaphyses; and for that, in making Balthasar succeed vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Affyrian warre I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annius his Danab. &c. Metaphyses, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeares he pleased amongst the rest. For in the third yeare of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when he rose vp, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares haue bene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. yeares, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his son and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeares following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euē.

Therefore Mercator, and others following him, fashion the yeares of Euilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeares giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28. yeares, and the two yeares that Berosus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2.) and in the later there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2.) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach reigned 28. yeares, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 48; then 17 yeares of Nabonidus or Balthasar, 9. moneths of Labassardach his son, and 17 yeares of Niglifar according to Berosus, make vp the number of 70. yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken in all copies extant; vpon how weak a foundation do they build, who hauing nothing to help them, saue only the bare names of two vknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to haue that place of Ieremy called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpose to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserveth to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeares, to Euilmerodach two, to Belsazer five: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59. yeares; beginning (as many do) the captiuitie 11. yeares sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath bene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betwixt the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition fruitles.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars reigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we finde in Ieremy, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his reignes, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the king of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authority of Berosus), were he perfectly extant) import: a farre longer time than two yeares, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue, it cannot be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eate bread before this King. Now, that he liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeares, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. yeares old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeares in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeares; after which time it seems plaine that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue bene but

but a young man; and one of Darius his Pages threecore yeares after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger giues the next five yeares, naming him also Laborsardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughters sonne, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berosus, by shewing in his Nirrigisthoros, as husband to Nebuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these yeares; by which means there remains about one yeare to Belsazer alone, agreeing nearly with the nine moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Niglifar. But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his 10 daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Person: for Berosus makes him of the same Race or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the manife of that most learned man (for it highly commendeth his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew, that hee himselfe hating in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approneth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things 20 therefore which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius took the kingdom, not saying that he wanne it by force of armes: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signify, that Darius tooke or received the kingdom; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasars death, but only the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecy. Neither could it indeed haue properly bene said (if Daniel had cared to vse the 30 most expresse termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the City, did winne the kingdom; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vfe. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alphicus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hecates; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdom, and rapt with a diuine fury, he cried with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come vpon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Affe, that shall bring slavery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he 40 vanished. Of all this I beleue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew beforehand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breſt. But that he wanne all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africke and Spain, I beleue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Affyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeede that same title of halfe an Affe, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Affes vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleue that one so iudicious, industrious and deeply learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoot himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Babylonia was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bekinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his Kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue beene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect Provinces, in so much that the Greek Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yet to cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Rame with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to belecue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, half so wel as Daniel, whom I beleue that he vnderstood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Romane world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars, yet will they not therefore be tied in generall by the selfe same Ethnick Philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth, as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in somethings it had not failed, the miracle had then beene very great.

S. V. I.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknesse, who cannot finde how the 70. years of captiuitie are to be diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Petrus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet haue failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to haue reigned ouer the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when he supposeth by Niglisar and Labofardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Emilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained,) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let vs consider the reigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yeare Ierusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth laid vtterly desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeares of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yeare more; and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest

Manifest it is, that the 19. yeare of Nebuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia, as also that his eight yeare, was the first yeare of Ischonia his captiuitie; the reigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Emilmerodach, it was in the sixteen and thirtieth yeare of Ischonia his captiuitie; so that Nebuchadnezzar, after his 3. yeare (vvhich was the first of Ischonia his bondage) reigned 35. vvhole yeares, and peradventure a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Ischonia was enlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the year. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzar reigne did well neere occupie, those eighteene yeares of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the city, we haue remaining fixe and twenty yeares of the secentie, that were almost wholly spent when his son began to reigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the secentie yeares were diuided between the Kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeares, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniectural; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoever shall discouer my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeares remaining in accompt of Nebuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs secentie yeares to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Emilmerodach fixe & twentie yeares. Of the yeare belonging vnto Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did reigne secentie yeares, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth me so much to belecue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeare of Balthasar hee followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a prooffe sufficient of no few yeares, passing vnder this mark, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel employments tooke end either that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, & being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midde-way. I haue already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Emilmerodach was not short, and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty yeares. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus, caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that booties of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much lesse ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, we finde not expresse; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; provided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath beene wronged by the carelesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more could. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character β signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of β that stands for 2. than hath γ , which is used for 3. So that the numerall notes β 5. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some trooked hand, or other mischance not vnsuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures; but the other correction of the other; which how it could be supposed in β standing for 2. I doe not well perceiue. As for the Arithmetical figures now in vse, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians; and therefore doe not appertaine vnto this businesse; vnlesse wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it bee; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authority, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme to be his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained, betwene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Egypt.

WITH what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure haue been some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet forgotten to be abridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people euen their being. For our Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some stouthfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures; perhaps, like the prodigall sons of greedy fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless trauell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuall, that his youthfull and stronger yeares hauing been exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthe labours past. The nineteenth yeare of his reigne it was, when destroying vttlerly the great and mighty Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, hee, vntill his three and twentieth yeare, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, employing all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyre did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appears by the wordes which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voyced of Tyre; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, euen in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, wherof we haue already spoken, began to appeare above the waters, and threaten them with inuincible mischief.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. years, that was prescribed vnto the reigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly shew, that he followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vttlerly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Town vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neurtherlesse it seemes that this euasion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For, not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serue a great service against Tyre, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held inuincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor vied the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdom of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seek occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it bin poorer, yet either it must haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neurtherlesse it was needfull, that before hee entered into this businesse, the Countries adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his daurion, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their sinnes had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their owne gaine, had some of them, like the Rauens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feed vpon the carcases that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries, which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his fury, he should be faine to forsake the desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their City was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue been with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practice had of Baalus king of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise, whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, & their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their treachurish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their deuires by sharpe and suddaine warre, ouerwhelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night, according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeares, as hauing reference to the third year following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition.

expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preferred by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-laws, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of the seventy yeares, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

§. V III.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of victory Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himselfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his backe, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremie, and Ezekiel, haue written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuertheless, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these Prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoyle in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helpes conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vphold a sentence, giuing testimony to one clause, doe carelesly overthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they fought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely referred vnto this place. Herodotus doth affirme that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to haue made vpon Tyris and Sidon) that he reigned fiftie and twenty yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne Subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on their dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reigne ouer such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, vho sent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driuen to trust vnto his forraigne Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerely agree, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyrenians and Phoenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other townes of Phoenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perished as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty yeares. The authoritie, were it more, were more than enough to informe vs of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than haue the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke sincerely into humane traditions. For Apries prophesied long before of the same full captivity of the Egyptians, in whom the King of Assur would carry away naked young & old, in such wise, that the Iowes, who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves. Apries did not but see the issue of his rebellion, so he handled this argument more prudently. For Ezekiel doth plainly say, that Egypt should be giuen to Nebuchadrezzar, as wages for the seruice which he had done in Tyre: Also hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and goe into captivity, yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slaine by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such meanings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed vnto Apries; by whose indeede, but by the vntime obedience of all the people. Certainly, it is that notable place of Isaiah, wherein he foretelleth how the Iowes in Egypt should see Pharaoh slaine, deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekiah had beene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion. Wherof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath concluded it; they say it was done of the same Prophet (which God forbid) that any Christian should thinke seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to haue in the clay of a battell, those very Stones, vpon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his Pannion spread. Yea, there was that prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: *Behold, I will arise, the common profit of N. and Pharaoh shall be Egypt, with their gods, and their things; when Pharaoh, and all that trust in him, shall be deliuered into the hands of strangers that shall take their times; and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The cleareness of this prophecy being such as could not but rectifie that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder, what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Isaiah, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, couyned vpon a vaine glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the history of Nabuchadrezzar was better knowne to the Iowes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleue Isaiah, reporting that Nabuchadrezzar in the three and twentieth yeare of his reigne, and the fift yeare of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodorus; who being mere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all aduantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Isaiah, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinkes the death of Apries can no way be approved as haueing bene wrought by consent of the people; but affords great matter of suspicion, yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodorus. For the great loue & honor which the Egyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimony of all others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodorus himselfe. How then can we thinke it probable, that Apries being wonne great victories, did for one onely losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Egypt would take, or so debase himselfe, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King* of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forraigner, and one that aimed himselfe against the Egyptians, willing them few and weak, rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull to set all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the Egyptians of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forraigne Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had stood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it, but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, to bee observed, where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

It is a great losse, that the generall History of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nebuchadnezzar; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth vpon his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are in a manner utterly lost, but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores; by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vaine security of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did little auail them in provision for the war, and much astonish them (as may lustily be thought) in the time of execution: it being vially scene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourescore years, but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness, yet so, that it was neuer dreadfull vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the Sonne of the wife, I am the Sonne of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the River failed them, the King himselfe was taken & slaine, and that ancient lineage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first year after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee (saw the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whom hee found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth year of Nebuchadnezzar, is not vnprobably thought by good good authority to haue bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tells, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinks that this was Amasis. How to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconueniency, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis; a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life & kingdom by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, & made war (as they report) vpon the Phenicians, who were before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; vnto whose should thinke that he had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince; and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but fruitfull to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleue, that Nebuchadnezzar made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may easily see; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey; it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authority of Iosephus; that his Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probably enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vse their liberty, and beleue what they list. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians & Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Provinces; as likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Bactra, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Historians, despoiled & slew Apries. I take them to haue been the Egyptian fugitiues, which they recovered their own Countrey. Sure it is, that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kinde. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keepe the Greeks from knowledge of their Counties disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know that

Of the sundry accounts Ararone from sundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Ninene, by him; the time of which action is uncertaine.

These victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's reigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar's times, might seeme to be the buel-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third year of Je-robababab's reigne (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first year) & was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence, it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein hee interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, foreshewing the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tells, that Egypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Traui, stating his prophecy in the second and twentieth years; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year; for these years held no dependance vpon either the beginning of

Nebuchadnezzar.

Nebuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire; nor yet upon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vaine search.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not read, excepting that against Nineue, the destruction whereof was foretold by the Prophet Nabum. Nineue had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar king, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehaiakim and Zedechias, tributary kings of Iuda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineue followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nabum, the Prophet made betwene this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already: But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinkes) impossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzars reign; the place of Nabum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecy of Nabum, which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiosity of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seek to learne what woman that Hecuba Queen of Nineue was, whose wofull captivity the same Prophet Nabum likewise did fore-tell.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

Of the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant; save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Iosaphus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megalhenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue bene reared, and finished in fiftene dayes.

But of all this, & other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatness abused him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vnderstanding well these iudgements of God vpon him: For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, & much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouery of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had scene and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vnto them repugnant to the law of him that is the King of kings. Hercof S. Hierome hath well noted; Pellex obliuio veritatis, ut quidam seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statum sibi seruabat, ut ipse quasi Deus in statu adoraretur: A hostis forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the seruant of God, as if hee had bene God himselfe, should now command a statue to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuey of those blessed Saints out of the fiery furnace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted assisted by an Angell; preferred from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour; by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answereable to his hasty zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head which Daniel expounding, aduised him to break off his sinne by righteousness, and his iniquities by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatned, but this threatening sufficed not vnto his information. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men; (according to the tenor of the dream & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eate grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might bee thought an idle dream, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole yeares leasure to repent was giuen to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue monethes, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, he vttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiesticall works which he had reared, as well becomming his maiesticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heauen, telling him that his kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioycing in works of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a iust measure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue been knowne to haue bene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to reioyce in those good things wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulness to entertain them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affection, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds, binding the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightness of eternall felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueeth of his own worth, doth about all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightning, & make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatness, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these malæ mentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorowes, cares, and feares: not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlike ioy of vengeance neere at hand, when these vnreasonable flushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue been humbled with a iust repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seuen yeares hee liued, not only as a saluage man, but as a saluage beast, for a beast he thought himselfe, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thom is noteth, and therefore fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe. Not that hee was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, in so much as hee appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was hee changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando di- der. in Sinop.
us (saith S. Ierome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; ubi- der. in Sinop.
he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, hee shewed that hee had not lost his humane shape, but but his understanding. Seuen yeares expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and euertlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his workes were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Cyrus, Carthufianus, and others. And for that place of Ezay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and foureteenth Chapter, speaketh of the king, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

§. XII.
Of Euilmerodach.

HAuing already spoken what I could of the succession and yeares of Nebuchadnezzars posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his father had gotten; and left his kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. Hee lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his reign, which was fortie yeares after his father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis foure and forty yeares of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fife and fifty, saying, that he died in the third yeare of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seuen and thirty yeares, which passed between the second yeare of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his reigne, wherein he was in Egypt; of which seuen and thirty yeares it is credibly held, that Panemius, the son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could bee no longer king than foure and thirte yeares. But seeing that these two Greek Historians haue bin abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceived in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answer to this obiection. For to say either that the numbers were mis-written, & foure & forty set down in stead of foure and thirti, or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Assyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute king of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proued out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became againe a kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the king of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foyle re- ceived by the Assyrian inuading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebel against him, I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tels, that the first seruice of young Cyrus in warre, was vnder Asyages king of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fiftene or sixteene yeares old. If therefore Cyrus liued threecore and three yeares (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Euilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances, insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder teames with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst haue vsed. Howsoever the quarrell beganne, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, vvhom in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a lingering Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Nabuchodonosor, who left the world in the nineteenth yeare of Euilmerodach, at which time Amasis was possessor of Egypt. So that the Assyrian ha- uing his hands already full of businesse, which more exactly did affect him, seemed thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Egyptians, of new erecting their king- dome, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebell after ages, and set up a King within it selfe, against the far more mighty Persian.

The first of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach, against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeares before vnto against Babel, by Ezay and Ieremie. For the Assyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue bound the Medes and Persians vnder their thickeshowes of arrows & darts; were encountered with an army of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whome they were beaten in open battell, where Euilmerodach was slaine. So that great foume of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and vp-held; being shaken and grievously cracke vnder his vnfortunate Son, was left to bee sustained by his unworthy Nephew, a man more likely to haue ouerthrowen it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

Appropriate coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Euilmerodach, without wrong to the Truth. The quality, and death of Balthasar.

I have already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successour to Euilmerodach, yet considering carefully the coniectures of those Writers, which following Herodotus, insert Niglisar, or Niglisar, and his son Labsarsadach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City. I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by vvhhat means it was possible that some error might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in vvhich Nebuchadnezzar liued vvhile among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddenesse of this accident, vvhich came in one houre, could not but vvhork much perturbation in that State, vvhicin doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which hath bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setting the gouernment, whilst the King was thus distracted, wee shall finde it most likely, that his Son and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach beeing to supply the vnter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors do the vnripenes of a young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and victfull workes about the Ruer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Nineue. Wherefore it were not vnrea- sonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and after- wards, as a motherly to leaue it vnto her vngracious son. Other time than this, when in Nitocris could haue reigned, wee doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglisar, who got the Kingdome from Euilmerodach, was his sisters husband; husband; which argues this to have been the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Nigliffar, it at the end of nine moneths reigne he were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vfe many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Enilmerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, named the year wherein he gave liberty to Jecania, doe plainly testifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Enilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeed haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar, who was his Son and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. Hee was from his young yeares of a mischievous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble young man that should haue married his sister, only for spight and enuy to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing thrown his laureline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman comending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to revolt from him vnto the enemies as soone as hee was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him. Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable, for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, euen whilest he was drinking in that vine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reigne of seuentene yeares, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as hee deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore, in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

HE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were tenne Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Princi pall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betwene them the Easterne Empire. Cyaxares (vvhom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar, the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Japhet; that they had Kings soone after the Flood, Lahtanius and Diadormus haue found record; For Lahtanius remembereth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diadormus speaketh of Pharynes with his seauen sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus; of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

who reigned

And though the Greeks ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs, that Darius was not only king of Media, & had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious ouer Balthasar was his, as the Assyrian & Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threecore & two yeares old: And further, what Osiris pleaded him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy: The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight & twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Cassor, Thallus, & others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subingated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians & Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

How the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who deny that Alyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmed, that Cyrus was no way descended from Alyages (whom he calleth Astius or Apania) but only that hauing vanquished him in battaile, & confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited, and seldom followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reprobued of wilfull vntruth.

Wherein a diligent & learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Alyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Cassor, Thallus, and Ptolemy, who doe not find any such Successor. Neither doe Tacitus, Theophilus Antiochensis, Iulius Africanus, Clemons, Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lahtanius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read; that hath giuen other Son or Successor to Alyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab autoritate negatine doth neuer enforce consent, we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme, that either Ahyages himselfe must haue bene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Balthasar. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life; being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and subiect to his authority; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victory ouer Babylon was wholly giuent to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe for this action, but for the deliury of his Church; a greater worke not only in the eyes of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchy, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among profane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, & did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of what soeuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his propheticke, makes it plaine, that himselfe not only liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the year of Daniels death, could not haue bin distinguished from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned ioyntly; Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophons relation of the warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynt forces vpon the Assyrians, and others.

These Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, & was become Lord of all Syria, & many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then be left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threecore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned, made an exceeding strong Army.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Crasus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse, to his assistance, alleging, that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easy, no nor possible for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe many adherents, as he compounded an Army of two hundred thousand foot, and threecore thousand horse; of which, tenne thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were ledde by Crasus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Ahyates; But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it selfe could no longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, possesse himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Crasus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters son, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leui'd, are numbred thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as vied the Dart or Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historiall truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in euery speech & circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own inuention, appropriating the fame to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politick discourse, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great warre.

For it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perse being Governour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honour & power to their posterity; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, untill such time as Deiaces tooke vpon him the full authority and maiesty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reigne of Deiaces, are vually accounted about an hundred and forty yeares, in the last sixty whereof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Succellours; whose great atchieuements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesseth, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to undertake any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet between these the succellours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deiaces to the first of Ahyages, there past aboute ninety yeares, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnadvised enterprise of the Assyrians & Babylonians, to haue wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susian, the chiefe City thereof. It is true indeede, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Ahyages, or both, had quarrell with Hyastates the father of Crasus, which after some fixe yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I do not finde any memory. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Country which they then possesse, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more security than fame: For if their Kings, being the posterity of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the gratefull which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very consonant & agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achamenes held the Principality of Persia from Father to Sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the father of Cyrus was King of Persia; than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Astages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her son (whose nativity hee feared) might be disabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobility.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should haue encreased, and his case been the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Authour, and as I thinke the deuiler of the mischiefe intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achemenides was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperity did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which hee would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, or had they beene the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

Achemenes.
Cambyses.
Cyrus.

Teispes.
Ariaramnes.
Arjames.

Hystaspes.
Darius.
Xerxes.

Of the Achemenides there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male failed in his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royall family is thus set down by the learned Reineccius.

Achemenes, the sonne of Perfes, first King of Persia.

Darius.

Cyrus the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa; who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artystoma and other daughters.

Cambyses had

Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had

Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis slaine by his brother Cambyses.

Of the second were those seuen great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royalty of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first known by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elyma; by Iosephus, Elymi.

Suidas deriues this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magusai; which Magusai, according to Eusebius, are not to bee taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wise men. So do the Greeks, among many other their sayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artai; & that they called themselves Cephenes. But that they were Elamites, Moses and the Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, Ezechiel, Daniel and *Esdra*s in many places confesse: Which also S. Hierome vpon Jeremy the five and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight, and also in his Hebrew questions, approueth, saying: Elam à quo Elamites Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that City which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persopolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimai, but is now called Sirus, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this City, now called Sirus, was not the old Persopolis; for Alexander at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Nimrod, and ioyned with him in the war against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and first actions.

Touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a riuer which watereth Persia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sunne, in the same Language. Howsoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord vnto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, & other Prouinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Craesus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in the last warre against Craesus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight & fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the five and sixtieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue bin vsed (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honor of hauing won Babylon it self, which in due place I haue answered. The latter seems to haue reference to the second War which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beseech with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Croesus the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon Cyrus.

I haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Craesus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (so prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the sonne of Atys: Which Family extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argan, descended from Heracles, whereof there were two and twenty generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his faire Wife naked to Gyges his Favorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queen and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys: his son, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) & Halyattes begat Craesus: Which five Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seauenty years. Halyattes the father of Craesus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it sixe years: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions between them.

Astages, the son of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argeneis, Craesus sister, whom he married,

But Craesus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King of Moharely of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioynd Phoenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence forward no Competitor during his owne life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men & treasure spent in the quarell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Aolis, Doris, & Ionia, Prouinces posselt by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia, gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Myrians, Paphlagonians, & other Nations. And that he also inforced the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their city with Diana's girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenaus out of Herodotus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victory which Craesus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacae: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and chunous of Cyrum fame, doubting also, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with many uellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrum. The vnderstanding from whom he receiued this riddle; Craesus passing ouer the River Halys, shall disclose great Dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandise of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

S. III.

Craesus his Expedition against Cyrus.

Hereupon Craesus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrum fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sardanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren & mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skins of beastes, not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, hee could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, & subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily betold, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solid counsaile, Craesus hauing prepared a powerfull army, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a city of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to surprishe or to force, Cyrum came on, & found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferiour to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for out of doubt, Craesus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not vnder any in territory and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane liberty, That Kingdomes & Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Craesus prosperity at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrum but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of diuers skirmishes, the Persians & Lydians began to ioyne in grosse troups: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nations: & as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Craesus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrum, and with all speede possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrum to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing

suspecting Cyrum approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troups of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of fixe moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

S. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrum in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discouered. But hauing good intelligence of Craesus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Craesus had disposed his Army to their Wintering garriisons: which being altogether vnlooked for, & vnfeared, hee surrounded Sardis with his Army: Wherein Craesus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens & ordinary Guards, after fourteen dayes siege the same was entered by assault, and all executed that resisted. Craesus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene dumbeall his life (by extremity of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiers to spare Craesus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, deposed of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which hee had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himselfe for happy indeed, till his end.

Which answer Cyrum being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune and his owne mortality, he commanded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to saue Craesus, and to conduct him to his presence: which done, Cyrum demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what selfe reason had conducted him to invade his territory; & to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered: It was thy prosperous, and my vnprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering theewithall my ambition) that were the inuencers and conductors of Craesus warre against Cyrum.

Cyrum being picrot with Craesus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a king and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat. And herein is the real difference discerned between that behauiour which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vnjustly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrum did friendly entertaine Craesus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuiers, and is here already set down, that hee should haue beene burnt aliue. It may very well be, that Xenophon portraying (in Cyrum) an heroycall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to bee forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-befecoming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that needesse of alliance might with-hold Cyrum (had hee beene otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoeuer it was, the Moral part of the Story hath giuen much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Craesus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrum did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrum past with his Army ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Craesus to accompany and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrum, & did afterward follow

Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians & Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Croesus.

§. V.

How Cyrus wonne Babylon.

After this Lydian War ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that ten whole yeares did passe betwene his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which neuertheless I doe not thinke to haue bene wholly occupied in provision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue bin spent in settling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Croesus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battell ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Spartetha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious army, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Croesus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pallias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, & Lycians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to raise that siege, & make frustrate the work vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care & strength vnto the taking of that City, which beside the fame & reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wal of great height, & surrounded with waters vnfloodable, so plentifully victualled for many yeares, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes & Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a City so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessities; whereof though the Towne was laid to be stored sufficiently for more than twenty yeares, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soone appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trouble, and all in vaine, if they did not keep streight watch and strong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they wereto gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their commander: The consideration whereof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having bin their ancient friends & allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of seruitude. While the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull and vaine gladnesse, that is the ordinary fore-runner of suddaine calamity; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentive, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, and so to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he he stayed the time of his aduantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vn-cut, betwene the maine riuer which surrounded the City, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weaknes within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publike Plaies and other Pastimes, and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobility, besides his wiues, curtizans, & others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were either sufficient, not onely for all needefull vses, but euen for iollity and exesse: Or because he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distresses were well nere broken, or in honour of Bel his most reuerenced Idol: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And hee was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vsing Daniels words) He lifted himselfe vp against the Lord of Heauen: For he & his Princes, wiues & concubines, made carowling cups of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he praised his owne puppets, made of Siluer & Gold, of Brasse, Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta sunt iustitia in vasis aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos landare: How great a foolishnesse was it (saith S. Hierome.) drinking in golden cups, to praise gods of wood and Stone. While Balthasar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him, certaine words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the loynes of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recocted, he cried out for his Caldreans, Astrologians, & Southsayers, promising them great rewards, & the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queen hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done, vsed this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the days of thy father, light and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, was found in him, euen in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queene, Iosephus takes for the grandmother, Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that she was not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and banquetting, she came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, & to comfort the King in his distraction: And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembered well what hee had done in the daies of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in minde both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different style from that hee vsed towards his Grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies; but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy rewards to thy selfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods iust iudgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, wherof the King and all his Wife men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefites, as he deprived him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presuming both to abuse those vessels dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power; praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Pharshin, gaue gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, & finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very euenig of night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his epiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose enligne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunity to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods iudgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them hee drew the great Riuer of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channell running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saued themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vnccertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the Kings Palace, which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who strugled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred yeares before this subuersion, who in his seuen and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction for feelingly and liuely, as if he had bene present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamity of this great Empire: yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of euery furuiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophesie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darknesse, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdoms. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vnto Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatry of the Iudæans, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wrath with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heauy yoke upon the ancient, I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: and whosoever inueth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wines ransished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the fame to posterity after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his prophesies, which were written two hundred yeares before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Salmus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diódorus Siculus may be taken, who findes the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that six chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geography giues it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five furlongs, which makes eight and forty mile and one furlong; but finds the wall farre vnder that which Diódore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickenesse but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; euery cubit containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the City he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred dred and fourescore furlongs circle: the thickenesse of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brass, with posts and hooles to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princesse & Glory of King: domes.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave, diuiding not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves vpon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue lasted onely seuen yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royall power to themselves and their posterity.

6. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

The last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuersly written. Herodotus and Iustine deliuer, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter between the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Sparapises that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leues of men of Warre, and following the Warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, vying these words, Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satisfie thy selfe.

It should heerby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their fury by some forcible inuasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Athyages, those Scythians inuaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a seruile subiection eight and twenty yeares.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) sixe yeares, and took end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Vigener, that this Scythian Warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the successe of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Vigener) because Strabo in his eleventh booke reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Iustine saith, he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorheus king of the Derbic ansa Nation (as the rest of Scythia, whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he suffered three daies after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne City of Pasagatides, which himselfe had built, & where his Epitaph was to be read in his time, which is said to haue bin this: Vir quicunq; es, & undecunq; aduenis, neque enim ad aduentum ignorauit: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum regitur corpus mihi ne inuides; Q; tuum man, quoscunq; tuum art, or whence eueuer thou commesst, for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, doe not enuy vnto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treasure, supposed to haue been buried with him, or vpon desire to honour his dead body with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set vpon it. These things well considered, as they giue credite to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his body in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, to retire off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media, neither had Cambyses beene able in such haste to have vnderaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleue Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged & in peace: and that finding in himselfe that he could not long enioy the world, he called vnto him his Nobility, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaxares; and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others of the immortality of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserting of euery man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that he receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he gouerned Sufa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the Prophecy of Esaie, wherein he was exprefly named, and by God (for the deliuey of his people) preordained. Which act of deliueyng the Iewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, vied for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth, which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Having therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Reigne, being perhaps the first that euer he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes should returne againe into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the three score and ten years captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored vnto them five thousand four hundred three score and nine Vessels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthazar had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Iewes which returned out of Chaldaea vnder their Leader Zerubbabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Ieconias, and Iosus or Iosua the sonne of Iosadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the re-building of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans & other idolatrous Nations adioyning, gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Iewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe, who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was builed otherwise, countenanced the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolve themselves out of Esdra. That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselves affirme, as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was 46 years in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the naturall and politique courses which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and forerigne Monarchie, we shall find them in that Epistle remembered by Esdra, written by Astages, Mithridates, & the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phoenicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire; as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most horrible impediment was, that Cambyses, being in his resolution to invade Egypt, & that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were defended of those Nations, because they illud thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudea, their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might foretune to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue observed; that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Gouernors of Phoenicia complained against the Iewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hyaspes, as in the fixt and seuenth chapters of Esdra it is made plaine; and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the fixt of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius, as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointments of the God of Israel, and by the commandments of Cyrus and Darius and Artahastae Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenth of Ezra it is written: Now after these things, in the reigne of Artahastae King of Persia; which was as much to say, as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdra is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxares his younger son to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and he died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one & thirtie yeares, or (according to Josephus) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hester.

C*Cyrus* had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amysis. Atossa & Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa being dead: who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Maccedonian) had against the Iewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Elther, whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hyaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly gounded vpon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the necre found of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Elther was also called) makes them to haue been one person. For though it be true, that Elther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Lady, yet Codoman inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the king bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Ester did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Historiēs could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Arofta, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The estate of things from the death of CYRUS to the reigne of DARIUS.

S. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

F the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings and their times, as followeth.

|---|--------|
| Darius Medus , and Cyrus ioynly | 2 |
| Cyrus alone. | 22 |
| Prifcus Artaxerxes . | 20 |
| Darius Longimanus . | 37 |
| Darius Nohus . | 19 |
| Artaxerxes Mnemon . | 55 |
| Artaxerxes Ochus . | 26 |
| Artes , or Arfames . | 4 |
| Darius the last, conquered by Alexander . | 6 |
| | years. |

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeares added, make in all an hundred and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melanon) of Darius the son of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanton coniectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beraaldus haue also a differing account from the Greekes, whom neuertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentschin, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reignes.

| Cyrus in all. | 30 |
| Cambyses , with the Magi . | 8 |
| Darius Hystaspes . | 36 |
| Xerxes . | 21 |
| Artaxerxes Longimanus . | 40 |
| Darius Nohus . | 19 |
| Artaxerxes Mnemon . | 43 |
| Artaxerxes Ochus . | 23 |
| Arfames . | 3 |
| Darius the last. | 6 |
| | years. |

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approue. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Pencer in his historickall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles chap. 36. verse 22. 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. verse 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly Cambyses in the eleuenth of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Genes vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberality to the Jewes being to elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Assuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great warre which he should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seuen, vvhich is also called Artabastus, c. 4. lib. 1. Ezra v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nohus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5. verse 6. Nehem. cap. 12. verse 22.

Seuenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arfames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Arofta Cyrus his daughter, and the illue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Alyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Cyrus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the siue and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third yeare of the threecore and third Olympiad and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betweene seuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Againe, this historickall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomickall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentieth yeare after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar began on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad, So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Tulian yeares, and an hundred and fortie dayes from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seventh yeare of Cambyses.

The Greekes and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third yeare of the threecore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seventh yeare in the first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, vvhich succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Era & the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty yeares) it agrees with the third of the threecore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, sauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements & confused accounts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, vvhich being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise vvvith the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyfes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the son of Cyrus, though degeherate in all things, saving the desire to increafe the greatnesse of his Empire: wherof he was possess in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the north. Ctesius with others giue him a longer reigne: than agreeth with the Grecian account before receiued.

In the fifth year of his sole reigne, and in the third year of the three score and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius he invaded Egypt, and hauing ouerthrown the King thereof, Psammetichus, he not onely caused him to be slaine, but also did purto death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesius giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when he sent to Amasis king of Egypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Niretis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyfes disdaind.

Howsoeuer it were true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammetichus, whom Ctesius called Amyrens, his succellour; who enioyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe yeeres.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battell he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered king, but that he also trusted him with the gouernment of Egypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or suspicion therof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But therace of this king was not so extirpated, if we may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides; but that he left a Son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammetichus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the king of Egypt, who died before his arriuall, that he caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

§. III.

The rest of Cambyfes his acts.

After this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Eucelbon king thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himselfe in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torne downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lycia, to ouerturne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Diuell in defence of his Oratorie raised such attempt of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is conered, as the Persians were there with choked and ouerwhelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdainning to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, vvhich himselfe meant to conduct into those parts; but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first sent troupe had tried, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements do not obey them, according to that old English proverb, God, saith the King, stay, saith the Tide.

After

After his returne from the attempt of Ethiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and bin executed as in seruice of him that onely is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his own sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroes then by himselfe, with child, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyfes, that because his predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Iudges, and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne sister: it being his own intent so to doe. The Iudges (vvhich had alwayes either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such conuention, but they notwithstanding found in their customes, that it was alwayes left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; & so, as Naucleerus termes it, innegant occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate satisfaction, he caused Sisamnus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestuous match, to be slayed: a lue, for a vniust iudgement giuen, and the same his hide to be hung vp ouer the iudgement seate. After which, bestowing the fathers Office on his son, he willed him to remember, that the same partialitie deferved the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the sonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange & vngatefull. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many observed, that he tooke more than vsuall delight in the taste of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he vsed this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they haue done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath bin spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects beleueed. This being spoken, he immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent childe, who falling downe dead vvvith the stroke, Cambyfes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioicing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolve thyselfe that I haue not lost my wittes with wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, til at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felix de Joy. For when he was informed that Pastizites, and Smerdis the Magi, Cadromus writeth them Sphenandanes and Cimerdijus Ministers of his domestical affairs, taking aduantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possess themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword dissheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where, with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late, & remediless repentance of the slaughter vvhich he had executed vpon his own brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, which he had reigned eight yeeres, accounting therein those seven Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was absent.

In Cambyfes the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Astasa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierame giues him a daughter called Pantaspes, and a son called Orontes, who being drowned in the Riuier Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe,

§. II. II.

Of the inter-regnum between Cambyfes and Darius.

Cyrus and his two sons being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Governours of the Empire (to wit, Otanus, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Alphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King, having discovered the fraud of this imposture, ioynd their forces together, surprised and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (saith Iustine) Intaphernes and Alphatines were slaine: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were onely wounded, for he auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence forth. Otanus one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equalitie, giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified, by the cruelties of Cambyfes; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, even in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, & the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of vicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants doe commonly vse the seruices of wicked men, and fauour them most; they vsurp vpon the lawes of their Countrey, take other mens wiues by force, and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Megabyfus vvas of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannic of a multitude vvas thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without iudgement, runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and out-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found, that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perswaded the creation of a king, because euen among few diurnitie of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforced the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to obserue the lawes of our Countrey, by which Kingly government hath bene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall government by God established, and made prosperous. And to auoid partialitie, vvas accorded, that the morning following these seuen Princes should mount on Horsebacke, and on him the kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment vvas made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his horse Cebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as soone as he came into the same place was the first horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the seuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Magi, he diuided the whole into seuen governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

Of Darius the sonne of Hytaspes.

§. I.

Of Darius his Lineage.

Darius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successor. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Tespis, who begat Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsamenes, the father of Hytaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Acerxes.

Hytaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at vvhich time Cyrus being made iekalous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Perse. Others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Governor of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then ioynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neyng of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wiues.

Hytaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Græce; Ararnes, Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Græce warre. Hytaspes had also a daughter married to Gabryus the Father of Artabanus, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the daughter of Darius. Artabanus his Cousin germaine. Artabanus giues to Hytaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artabanus, Otanus, and Ararnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius deuided all lawes whereby his subjects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subjects, and admitted himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he layed diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourtheene thousand five hundred and threethrety talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyfes made a faire off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi and the Princes of Persia for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recover their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recover that Citie and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopyrus, who for the loue he bore Darius, did cut off his owne Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yett fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduise to giue over the siege of their Citie, had in this sort discombred and deformed him: whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that Credite, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after some finall coloutable overthrowes giuen to the Persians vpon sallies, he deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had been before it twentie Moneths.

§. III. Of

¶ Of Darius his favour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Jerusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the revenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Governours of those Prouinces which are situate betwene Euphrates, and the Phenician; & mid-land Sea, (whom Hecataeus calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindered the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thenceforth comence or vnto Jerusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selves farre from them. In our Englishe, Be ye farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

He also made a decree, vvch concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should become downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God; That hath caused his name to dwell there (to destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In foure years after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished vvith money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

S. IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Tosius called Lambinus, and saith, that Darius vnderooke this warre against him, because he refused him his daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, he built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, & gaue the custody of the same in charge (among others of the Ionians, & Solians, among whom vvvas Miltiades, vvho perswaded the Asian Grecians, to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Hystianus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionis, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Country, because they ioyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, vvhen they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Armie of Darius entering the desert Countrie, called Desfaria, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians verthen, as are the Chirm Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vvith the Bow and Sword. They vvore not Plough-men, but Grasers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggonss vvherin they carried their wiues and children. These Waggonss they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chirm, any other Citie than such as Agava, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had sweared himselfe, and vvasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, vvithals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, vvch either he himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into vvch he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a bad game, he sent braue messagers to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour & fortune in plaine battail: Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeelde by

by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeilded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer, sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse; and fiew Arrows: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne vvith, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons vvithall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the feuen Creatures, vvho had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a right, vvch was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dye vnder the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, vvho assailed the Persian campe, drave the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Armie vvith continuall Alarums day and night; vvre so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so litle regarded him, that vvithin his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, vvch they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forooke his Campe by night, making many fires, & leauing all that were sicke and weake behinde him, & so vvith all speede marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, vvho mist him, yet arriuing at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian king should neuer more be able to do them either good or harm. Vvch vvords had certainly bin proued true, had not Hystianus the Miletian prevailed vvith his people, to attend the continuing of Darius, vvhom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, vvhen they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

S. V.

DARIUS hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in vvch Warre he employed Megabazus, vvho mastered the Peronians, and transplanted them, and possessed Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Oranes, the son of Sylamnes, vvhom Cambyses had exoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, vvho hauing now reduced vnder his obeycance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Alexander King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the soverainty ouer that kingdome. AMINUS doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadors vvith gentle vvords, and afterward inuited them to a solemne & magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: vvch being granted, the Embassadors vvho were well filled vvith vvine, and presumed vvpon their greatnesse, & many vvictories, began to vse such imbrancings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, be sought his father to vvithdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, vvhom vvithall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a vvhile, promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of vvell-fauoured young-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, & to vse the same attires vvch the Ladies had vvorne at the feast, giuing them in charge, That vvhen the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthvvith transpierce them vvith their long kniues, of vvch they were prouided for that purpose, vvch was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somvvhat before the death of AMINUS, gaue his Sister Cygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, vvho perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon vvould proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, vvch threatened to fall vvpon him vvry suddenly; the vvay of Asia the lesse, called Ioniack, falling out at the same time.

S. V. I.

The first occasion of the warre which Darius made upon Greece, with a rebearfall of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOW the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great War, which followed soone after, betwene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither do I hold it any impertinency, to be large in vnfoldiing every circumstance of so great a businesse as gaue fire to those wars, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former booke it may be gathered, how Athens, & other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, & in severall times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Iudea, so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fiftene defectes bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former booke remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former gouernment from Monarchicall to Princes for tearme of life, of which Medon the son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontides, and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

Agellus.

Archippus, in whose times the Greekes transported themselves into Ionia, after Troy an hundred and fourescore yeares, according to Eusebius: which migration all other Chronologers (such as follow Eusebius herein excepted) finde in the yeere after Troy fallen one hundred and fortie.

But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the Solon, & others, who are the lesse to be regarded, by reason of the yearely change. This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three & thirtieth yeere of Tarquinus Priscus, and were in after ages deriued vnto the Romanes, and by the Decem viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernment; the state of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles & Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, & fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue beene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens; he procured agard for his defence, and with that band of men surprisng the State-houle, or Citadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the towne, Pisistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in every change of gouernment had sought to remoue themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driuen for lacke of helpe to fflye the towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus (ioyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement, so was it soone after well rectified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the vsual practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage, by which alliance the Family of the Alcmaonides, vvhof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long, the Alcmaonides, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdeemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discovery of their intent, perceived no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleuen yeares. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he gouerned Athens seuentene yeares, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeares, saith Ellianus, but as Justinus hath it, foure and thirty, accounting the time belike as well before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus giues the Father and the Son fixe and thirtie yeares, Aristotle fixe and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors his two sons Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall Successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise vpon his brother had more & deeper rootes than were apparant, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lamachus: who because she would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Thend Hippias the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a stratamity with Alcibiades, Tyrant of the City Lampacus, whom he knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose son Hippachus he gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practise against himselfe, he began to vse the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised, during their vsurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuey: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaonides, together with an Armie of the Lacedemonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias by composition he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence embarking himselfe, tooke land at Sigean, whence he went to Lampacus in Asia gouerned by Antides, who presented him to Darius. He was depriued of his estate; as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty yeares before the battell of Marathon: all which

* Sigean a prominent opposite to the Ile of Tenedos, which Antides ruled. Antides was a Lampacus.

Darius.

Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprise vpon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour vnderooke, twenty yeares after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motives of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him sollicite, & perswade the Persians to conquer Greece; was one, but not the most vrgent.

§. VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwene Greece and Persia.

Another, and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enjoyed their liberty about 500. yeares, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cyrus, whereby this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Seruants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witness Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all means possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian bin giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutiful affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they vied all means to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had bin lost) out of the Seythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Histiæus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Seythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were ready to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histiæus (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found means to carry him a-long to Susa, where he detained him with all kinde vsage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Histiæus had subtilty enough to discouer the kings purpose which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territory, than to sit & last at the great Kings table, & heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed, being himselfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none of their pleasures than a private man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfy the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving vpon this counsell, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprise vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: & the better to draw the whole Countie of Ionis into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did set Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he took and sold as slaues to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof he lately had bene Admirall in the enterprise of Naxos, he had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall

Officers and Captaines; so that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, vlesse he were able to raise an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourney to Sparta, where hauing alayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fifty talents, to win to his party Clæpentes King of the Lacedæmonians; he went from thence to Athens, and with better success beguiled the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had bene sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found very churlish entertainment; So that the cuill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinity with the Ionians, & the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on a pace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage, to which the Eretrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kindnes that had passed between the Ionians & them. With these and their owne forces ioyned, the Ionians entered the River Cæstrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus; by which aduantage they surprised Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; inasmuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safety, than by retreating himself into the castle; which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the ruler Pactolus, which ran through it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well aduising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, & found them neere Ephesus; where setting resolutely vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Army, the rest sauing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Enaulides, Captaine of the Eretrians perished: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent vnto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, nor by their tears, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brately proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne hereupon to take heart; and entering into conspiracy with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aide by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom he vowed to take sharp reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, & their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the solicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus farr on foot, being like enough to haue proceeded, though he had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Grecques; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Islanders moreover did helpe to furnish out a Naue of three hundred and sixty saile against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Ile of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neyther was that victory of any vseto them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being vtterly beaten by the Persian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subiection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two batailles, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Arifagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to feat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territory belike he landed, ouerthrew him, & cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vnderaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to fflye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this euasion preferued him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seems that he would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heauie king of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shute for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their City by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet, which promised vnto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking him vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse sight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for fixe years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with the battaile of Marathon, and Darius his death.

His Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who ioyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Embassadors demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well reſolued as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forc't them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demaratus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Army ouer the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty yeares before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Gouverneur of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, Herod lib. 6. Whether this Cite or People were of Peloponnesus in Sicily, or of Asia, between the Hellespont and the Propontis, I doe not know: but those borders, and next the enemies, were more likely to compound than the rest farre off.

There is also a City called Æginum, not farre from Ægina, Liuit 32. 33, &c.

imbarcked themselves in fixe hundred Gallies and other Vessells, and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the lesse, and Greece: But (obtainning those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea, but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieve themselves in their passage, and shrowd them (sakes from all suddaine tempests and outrages) both by day and night.

To this end they first possessed themselves of Samos, secondly they attempted Naxos, which Island the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apella was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to sacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacris and Apella erected. And hauing recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Euboea for that citie, (as already hath bene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the raising & firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took Eretria and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after fixe daies assault, partly by force, & in part by the treason of Euphrates and Philagrus they took it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus for the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Euboea the Persians past their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their own vermes against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and with all away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides who passing through Arcadia, encountered in the way a familiar Diuall which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battaile to assist them & defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing hee could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auaunting to bring newes from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was somewhat likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue bin more stirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any iust cause or solide reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Plataeans (who hauing bene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremity witnesse their thankfull and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians; and one thousand of the Plataeans. In the end, and after great diuersity of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battell, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the body of a battaile. The Persians when they perceived so small a troupe aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispossessed of their vnderstanding, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made shew. So inuincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies therein view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and so sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not these great forces of Darius were disordered & put in rout; the Athenians following their victory euen to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their ships.

The Persian Army consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, eyther by strange visions, which were afterward called Panics or terrores, or by some other affright, it seemed, that the invading Army, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their hurrying away. As for Justinus report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor probability of truth. In this fight Hippias the persuader of the enterprise was slain, saith Isidore and Cicero; but Suidas tells vs, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

Ad. Ali.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Astibades, who both persuaded the trial by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the down-fall which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus & Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyras following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, & hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left, of which also being deprived, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeare of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the son of Amynas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hyldas, after Halicarnassus.

In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threecore and ten Gallies, after fixe and twenty dayes assault hee brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruises past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuy of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlelle people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slavery. Miltiades left behinde him one son called Cymon, begotten on Hegesipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leues of men, & all other warlike prouisions. But the Egyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength & reueme) greatly distracted his resolution for the reuinuation of Greece. The dissension also among his sons, of whom the younger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Aossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and ioyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned fixe and thirty yeares. He left behinde him fixe sons, namely Artabazanes, borne before he obtained the Kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes Governour of Egypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

S. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes receiued from his father, as hereditary, a double Warre, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to iudge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Arsaspes, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabazanes, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vnder-taking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variable pelfe of his owne nature, which only the diuine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabazanes, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Egypt was ended, foure yeares were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of seuentene hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the severall Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were ioyned some others of Xerxes his neere kinred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slain, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Darius, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phoenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aolians, and Hellepontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia; as by Ariabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artabazanes, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princess of Halicarnassus, and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was imbarcked.

§. I. I.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: hincutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Hellespont: and the discourse betwene him and Artabanus vpon the view of the Army.

WHen this world of an Army was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous & repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of foure hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celasus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes his whole Army. The Feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Silver, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Darics, which make so many of our Markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not onely refuse his treasure offered, but comāded that seven thousand Darics should be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But sōone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his sūnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne son) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he comāded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine & the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of vse, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so seuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophrysus, Acrothoon, Thyfus, and Cleonæ.

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellespont betwene Abidus & Sestos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and disieured: where with Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slain that were, masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threecore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phœnicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into & from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Army of seuenteen hundred thousand foot, and fourecore thousand Horses, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past ouer it into Europe in seven dayes & seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward vse. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Army brought neere to the Sea-side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried vp, and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning; and after hee had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Army and Fleet, hee suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, that in one hundred yeares there should not any one stirrue of that marvellous multitude the cause of which sudden change of passion when hee vitered to Artabanus his Vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembered, is, That the life it selfe which we enioy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor life where, that can find himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but when he oftentimes pleads himselfe better with the desire & hope of death than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows which to mankind is subject, being so many and inuincible, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear vnto vs our long, to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to our-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the iudgement of Greece against him, which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to doubt freely with him. Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success; Artabanus, notwithstanding that hee assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and started not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet hee told the King, That there were many things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should consider, as he feared, to be most aduersie, to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: inasmuch as, if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Harbours thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such sleeker shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the vnstatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of means to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered dis-inable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vicer what indeed he most feared: to wit, the ouerthrow of the Army it selfe both by Sea and Land, which hee soon after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For, to invade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second vpon England in the year 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Council of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Army, which could not haue in it lesse than two millions of Soules; besides his beafts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vse Machiavels words, Mountebanks sayings, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, steepe, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food besides what serued themselves for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine, but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleuee Herodotus the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylae, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Landresses, Harlots, and Horses; and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconueniences, he should neuer pursue the same farther, than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatness, or possesse so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vnderaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured; and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weak countess whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace & Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour, and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Nam vires habent, sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled & furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, or brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot bee resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut downe the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceiued both of his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom hee employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, hee himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprise, was in the Summer following vterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army ouer the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the Riuer of Liffus was drunke dry by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Pissyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece), he will speake of the encounters he had, & the shamefull & incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which diuide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedaemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatae & Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, & other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seuen hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole daies together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first daies fight, Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Graecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of Mountains, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedaemonians, with his three hundred, & seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had vnderaken to make good, & with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers & Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bin present at these battailes, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Diemeas the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hide the Sun, he answered thus, It is very good newes: for then shall wee fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution hauing as freely been expressed in deeds, as it was vtered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the city of Sparta contained well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, & that the other Lacedaemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, banished king of the Spartans, who had alwaies well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that straight neck of ground which ioineth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause hee aduised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoile the country, & to hold the Lacedaemonians & their neighbours busied at home; whilst Xerxes at his leasure hauing subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of the cour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedaemonian should bee verified, that it were better for his Country-men to haue that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken, had it bin followed, it is not casie to ghesse. But a contrary opinion of Achemenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grievous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therefore Achemenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet, for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Navy, which holding altogether is invincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-army and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, & lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceiued, for about the same time that his army had felt the valour of the Greekes by land, his Name likewise made a sorrowfull prooue of their skill & courage at sea. The Grecians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Euboea, where the Persians thinking to incasse them, sent two hundred sayle about the Iland to fall vpon them behinde, vnder like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not unlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which diuideth Euboea from the maine, was in the same sort held by a Navy of two hundred three-score & eleuen saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navy might haue bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, & the cause of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking & sinking thirty vessels, forcing the rest to take the Sea, where being overtaken with foule weather, they were driuen vpon the rocks and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navy of the Greekes was increased by the arriual of fifty three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeem their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policy, they resolved in plaine fight to repaire their honour, & casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether gether as heaue vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beate it. Herein only the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsooke the place of fight, leauing the wrack & spoils to the enemy, who neuertheless were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had undertaken to defend, both for that many of their shipes were sorely crusht in the battaile, & especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, General of the Athenians, engraue vpon stone at the watering place, and other mistacles, to the Ionians, that either they should revolt vnto the Greekes, or stand neuter; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

6. I V.

The attempt of Xerxes vpon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

When Xerxes had passed the Straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the country of the Phocians, & the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flye, and reserve themselves to a day of battell, than to adventure their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth, by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his army he sent to spoyle the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there bene made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which arrived at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rockes that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rockes remained euen to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whether they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious, for seeing he beleued that Apollo was a god, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impiety, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoile his gods? and elsewhere, Hath any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Cedar, and take diligents heede, and see whether there be any such thing. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleaged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the City of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground & cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeede, in the enterprize against Delphi, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discovered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vgly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kinde by meere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be exprest briefly thus: Hee came to Athens, which findin: for saken, hee tooke and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeede was defended a while by some of more courage than wildome, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boords and Palisadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied vpon the prophecy: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had before the comming of Xerxes remoued their wiues and children into Troezen, Aegina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, & the common liberty of Greece. Neuertheless, this great great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Country, was ill required by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they remoued their wiues & children out of the City. But when the city of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which necke of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, & so to defend Peloponnesus by land & sea, leauing the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the fury of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Aegina haue been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of security) haue bene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition, but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne, which they would not hazzard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis. As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedaemonian, Admirall of the whole Fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the first) cause them also to disseuer the Fleet, and eury one of the Confederates to with-draw himself to the defence of his owne City and Estate: Then to the Councell of Warre, which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer shipes, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Aegina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once look vpon, if the Greekes obtained victory by sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gaue him so good aduantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Country of his owne to inhabit. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more than all his former perswasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-neere two hundred good shippes of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leauing those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italy belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proceesse of time should build it a new, & there (quoth he) will we plant our selues, leauing vnto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your own vnthankfulnessse. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceived, vpon so weak termes, that they should be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend euen to the vntomost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessity should inforce them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty; did imploy the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauie. By these meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great aduantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new shipes, they did somewhat amend their Nauie. Wherby it came to passe, that, had they bin vanquished, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either present death or perpetual slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would haue flood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soon perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forgoe the lesser, which they had conceiued of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent bruary, they yielded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

*How the Persians consulted about gining battaile: and how Themistocles by policy held the 20
Greekes to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.*

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed vpon the fight, but Artemisia Queen of Halicanassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greek Nauie (vnable otherwife to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be dislouered, and euery one seeking to preferre his owne City and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had won so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battell, so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall vndergoe, than any need requireth vs to aduenture vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, we siting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vtterly dash, and many that now declare for vs, will soon reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolved vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue bene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flattery made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vaine periuasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agalæus; which is opposit vnto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of euery Captaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Country-men shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Army, marching a-pace thither; did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreaty, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the victory, they should be drinen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Herupon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently been done, if the wisdom of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiving what vniuersal feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this vnwholesome decree; nor suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake vp, he dispatched secretly a trusty Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauie about the Iland, which encompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no looner heard than beleecued these good newes, well knowing that the victory was their owne assured, if the Athenian fleet ioynd with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Pisittæa, which lyeth ouer against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Grecian partie, as by any misfortune should bee cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessity enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet; which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to haue wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina hauing possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

§. VII.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER this victorie, the Greekes intending by way of scrutiny, to determine which of the Captaines had best merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his owne name, but in the second place, as best deseruing next vnto himselfe, almost euery Salamis did concur vpon Themistocles. Thus priuate affection yielded vnto venture, as soone as her owne turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, beganne to cast a wary eye vpon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should bee rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purposing rather to aduenture his life in pursuite of the victorie, than to cast it away by vndergoing his Princes indignation; hee aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to soothe Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, That the cowardise of those Aegyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaued themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies bene victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it self, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently betooke himselfe to his iourney homewards, making the more hast, for that hee vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hellespont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue bene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades giue counsell, that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessitie should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement vnto this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolued: which counsell Xerxes tooke very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driu to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly matterall; though the Greekes did most willingly embrace the later of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

Nnn

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedemonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now reentered their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wiues and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriuing before the Macedonian had audience, vied the best of their persuation to retaine the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any preence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatened the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltye of injustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driu to forsake the Towne, the houses thereof be ruined, and vsur for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, onely desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once receiued such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obdurate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselves into places of more securitye abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arriuall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not onely to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, and to haue those which were already laid waste, reedified at the kings charges; Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needs they would relie vpon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lysidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrcilus admitted the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house, heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether he were seduc'd or moony, that had moued him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bruterie notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide; they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and facing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very seuerer messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknesse, & threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed carelesse & dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quick resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie contained in it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where need should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had aduentured ouer-farre. So mutuall feare preferred in quiet the Ilands lying in the midst of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and reasonably obserued by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: considering that many doores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedemonians vpon this admonition, making better perusal of their owne dangers, were very careful to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delays, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, vnder conduct of Pausanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse, deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedemonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were nevertheless contented with the small conclusion; & leuying the number appointed of Lacedemonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Greekes were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse; wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating downe the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escap'd the fury of War.

The great battaile of Platæa.

IT were too long a rehearsal to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greekes and him, in the Country of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the scene of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the trial of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army, to whom were adioyned the forces of Thibes, Macedony, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedemonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thouland wereweightly armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more lightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two Armies having eleuendaies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victuals began to faile, relolued to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making priayers vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to find the certaine place, which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neare vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphes and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citharon, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plataeans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plataeans to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataeans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to redifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Aedes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedemonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes & Persians had felt heauie proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. Some whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lie neare to that fountaine which did serue all the Campe. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge, and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedemonians being ouer-taken by the enemies horse, and ouerwhelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall make lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in a pace to succour the Lacedemonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes, confederated with the Persians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuerthelesse, the Spartans with other their assistants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fled into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity enforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assailing Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour & courage obtain victory, which hauing not long purloined, they came to help the Lacedemonians, whom they found weakly bulied in assailing the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-took it, & in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such fury, and lust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand allue; excepting those who fledde away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy Country, against an Army of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enflamed with present victory. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemy, did now impale them, and leaue them to the slaughtering fury of vnspittfull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly and other Countries in his way, that hee was sent by Mardonius vpon some piece of seruice: For he well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would haue bene hostile vnto him; and sought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnderaken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of Honour, and Conquest, though forcing otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and sought to haue bene brought into slavery. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

The same day on which the battaile was fought at Platae, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Hlanders & Ionians, did saile into those parts, to deliuer the Sonians, & procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lidia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threecore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionis and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artañotes and Ithamitres, Admirals of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Palisades & otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their land & sea-forces. Leutychides at his arriual, perceiuing that they meant to keep within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his gally close aboard the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians), exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, & vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Salamis, trusting that either these persuasions would preuaile, or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breed some ialousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their own companions. It need not seeme strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to persuade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing eare to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauery, little regarded and lesse feared any treaton to be contriued by their subiects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their armes, the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuises little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies Campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Army, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Aemilius ouerthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure dayes, as Liuie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinius and the Latines, presently noyed at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour, which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was sodainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publike ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Authour of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his iourney against the Rebelle; and being now with his Army in march, hee received aduertisement by Poste, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembreing the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victory, he found that the report and victory were borne vpon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make about hve and twenty hundred miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames) among many thousand vaine and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses, as hee raised the siege of Samaris, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as hee threatened Sennacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and he shall haue a noyse, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilst they went wandring to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Plataea being noyed among them; euery man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to work out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies Campe, the Lacedaemonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedaemonians could arrive on the other part) & being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palladaes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good seruice, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who vpon the like ialousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-patches. The Lacedaemonians that day did little seruice, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes, making them flee dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leauied against Greece, which was now vterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little mind had he to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen over to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom he could not preuaile by intreaty, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: he thought it best to make a match between his owne Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to finde occasion of such familiarity as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him; he sooone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Army in war. This yong Lady hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife, caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuerlation with her, which she imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceiued extreame hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might be giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer she should inflict vpon the innocent Lady, granted the request; & sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that he vnderstood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to be vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; allcauding his owne loue, her deservings, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when he returned home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masistes conuinged with this villany, took his way with his children, & some Friends, towards Babylonia, of which Prouince he was Gouernor, intending to rebell & avenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Army to be leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is ioynd with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouerthrowne, and lying vpon the ground, said; That he doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischance done by him to Greece, should bee lye. But surely whatsoeuer his other other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercileffe.

Therefore we may firmly beleue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, & other worse Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In wars against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had beene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his posterity, did euer make offensive warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale serued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraigne Country: wherof good triall was made forth-with, and much better prooue as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maiesty of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely vpon the riches and power that had formerly beene acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue beene enervated, made vnruly, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielousie vrged every City to enuie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

S. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

Fer that the Medes and Persians had receiued their last blow, & were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leutichides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Ionians, returned with the Lacedaemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had beene leauied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a City on the strait of the Hellespont, betwene which and Abdus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Asia, & the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troizen, they now found them out, & returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and

and the wals of the City ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to forsake their City, before they cared to couer themselves, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Wherof the Lacedaemonians, being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne City of Sparta was vawalled, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate mislike or ielousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better State to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would beque to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedaemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their wals to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedaemon, giuing him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriual of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedaemonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arriual of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily grown vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine rumours, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he aduised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedaemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few daies, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedaemonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedaemonians to beleue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Common-weale & their owne safety, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not there-to taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the Wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedaemonians finding the time vsit for quarrell, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision; & so suffered the Athenians to depart, & receiued backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The Wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pireus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves vpon all occasions.

S. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persian.

THE Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedaemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strenglened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedaemonian; where, after their landing hauing possesed themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Army againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the

the Perſians by force the City Bizantium, now Conſtantinople, from whence Perſian, behaving himſelfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, eſpecially towards the Ionians, lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedamon, and not onely accuſed of many inſolent behauiours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, & Treason againſt his Country. In his ſtead they imployed Dacres, who either gaue the ſame cauſe of offence; or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt commandement in that warre, piaciſed the ſouldiers to complaine; though indeede the wife and vertuous behauiour of Ariſtides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable ſincerity, had been able to make a good Commander ſeeme ill in compariſon of himſelfe, & therefore was much more available, in rendering thoſe deſtroyed, whoſe vices afforded little matter of excuſe. Howſoeuer it were, the Lacedemonians being no leſſe wearied of the war, than the Athenians were eager to purſue it, the one obtained their eaſe, and the other the execution and honour which they deſired: for all the Greekes (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubiected themſelves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatneſſe in that preſent age, & of their ruine in the next ſucceeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receiuers and Treasuſers, & began to leuie mony according to their diſcretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of thoſe places on Europe ſide, in Aſia the leſſe, & the Ilands, from the Perſians. This tribute (the firſt that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threeſcore Talents; which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that iuſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the confederates reſerred themſelves, & no one man found occaſion to complaine of him. But as the venue of Ariſtides, & other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; ſo the deſire which they conceiued of increaſing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, & robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treaſure, which with her in the next age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe foure hundred and threeſcore Talents were raiſed to ſix hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetouſe tyranny had conuerted their followers into ſlaues, and extorted from them yearly thirtene hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at the firſt appointed for the Treasuſe-houſe wherein theſe ſummes were laid vp, and where, at the generall Aſſembly, the Captaines of thoſe forces, ſent by the confederates, were for forme ſake called to conſultation. But the Athenians, who were ſtronger by ſea than all Greece beſides, had lockt vp the common treaſure in an Iſland, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the ſonne of Miltiades, who firſt tooke Eion, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros, inhabited by the Delopes; they maſtered the Cariffs, & brought into ſeruitude the Naxi, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or diſobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vſurping a kinde of ſoueraigne authority ouer the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the warre in their owne perſons, and giuen vp altogether to their eaſe, made choice rather to pay their parts in mony, than either in men of warre, or in ſhips; leauing the prouiſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Warres; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honorable ſeruices, at the coſt of thoſe, who hauing liſted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony leuied vpon theſe their confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall ſcoured the Aſiaticke Seas, took in the City of Phaſelus, which hauing formerly pretended neutrality, and reſuſed to relieue, or any way aſſiſt the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he ſet ſayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of ſixe hundred ſayle, (or according to the moſt ſparing report) three hundred and fifty, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the ſhoare; all which forces hauing bene prouiſed for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vitally deſeated in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians, the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunk, ere euer they had ſwom in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoone preſented with a third. For foureſcore ſayle of Phenicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, vnder the Perſian command) thinking to haue ioyned themſelves with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arriued vpon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Vpon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they onely fought to run themſelves on ground; by which meane preſeruing few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſian, that, omitting all hope of preuailling vpon Greece, he conſcended to whatſoeuer Articles Aſia pleaded the Athenians to propound, granting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Aſia; and further couenanting, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the empire of Perſia; in which war, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but ſerued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily haue bin repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gaue iuſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his Maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the blood of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repoſe leſſe hope of a ſaſetie remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignie, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty, and deſpised for his cowardice and miſfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had been innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſon of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſſe he got the Kingdome, and held it ſeuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the ſon of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and ſurpriſed, were hard to affirme any certainty. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken hee was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

*Raro antecedentem ſeleſtum

Seldome the villaine, though much haſte he make,
Laine-footed Vengeance failes to ouertake.

§. IIII.

The baniſhment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; & his death.

ARTAXERXES being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, and hauing ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greekes, than he or his predeceſſors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merits in that ſeruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themſelves to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democratichall. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preferre the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatness vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they laide vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten yeeres, as a man over-burthened to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of consulting with Paulanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himself into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of advancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Isurus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceived much vnlikeliness of good successe, in leading a great Army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

hen was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, & thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to haue been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proof of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate, yet all the Sea-coast (no smal part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far over-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worse fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues & power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countreys, or to infest one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Island, vvas on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morfell, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Isurus King of the Lybians conuincing Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceiued rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Guards, or leuie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated; the naturals of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him, vvhoo had no other title to that Kingdom than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for King. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achamenes the Viceroy, diuers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the warre. But he considering his owne weakness, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarked; he inuited the Commanders to share with him the kingdom of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue bin contented with an equall share, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnecessary. He vvas possessed of the peoples loue, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires vvas such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes vvell deuise what means to vie for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preseruation of the remainder. The best of his hope vvas by setting the Lacedemonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This vvas the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainment of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, vvhom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to imploy the rest of his mony and means to their reliefe, who had now the space of fixe yeares defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, vvhoo arriuing in Egypt, vvas first encountered by the reuolted people; ouer whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as Prosopites an Island between the Ruers of Taly & Pharmacia, two of the out-lets of the Nile, so assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, saue a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same end towards Alexandria, had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred.

Menelaus is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Buſiricus and Pharos. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the Citie Panophyſis.

hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie vvvas continued, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vvas among the Phenician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This vvasthe end of the Athenians sixe yeares vvwarre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indifcretion to vndertake many enterprises at once.

§. V.

Of other warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Italia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cerophalia; the other ouer the Aginians, neere vnto Agina; where they sunke and carried away threecore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Agina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, vvith equall losse, the Corinthians, vvhen they returned againe to set vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, vvere vtterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians vvere discomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedemonians, vvho returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at vvhich time the Theſſalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threecore daies after the Athenians entred Boeotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, vvhen beating that Nation, they wan Phocia on the gulfe Ostentus, and euened the wals of Tanagra, to the ground. Finally, they enforced Agina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beat downe the wals of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute, the siege vvhereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These vvere the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those sixe yeares that a part of their forces made warre in Egypt. In the end vvhereof they attempted Theſſalie, persvaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharſalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sictonia, and had victory ouer those that resisted, after vvhich they made truce vvith the Peloponnesians for five yeares, and sent Cimon into Cyprus vvith two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, vvho held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to vvhom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, incountrd a fleet of the Phenicians and Cilicians, ouer both vvhich Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe vvhich vvwere sent into Egypt.

§. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahasuerus the husband of Queene Hester.

These Egyptian troubles being ended, the reigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; vvhereof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeares, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and forty. He

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His fauour was exceeding great to the Jewes; as appeareth by the Histories of *Esdra*s and Nehemiah; vvhich fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King vvho gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it vvwas a needlesse traualle; considering that all the late Divines haue taken very much paines, to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building in such sort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahasuerus vvho married Hester. Vvhereof if it be needfull to giue prooffe, it may suffice; That Ahasuerus liued in Susa, reigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must haue bin a Persian; That he liued in peace, as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, & vvied the countaile of the seuen Princes, the authority of vvhich Princes began vnder Darius, the son of Hystaspes, vvherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres vvhich excresced King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together vvith the certainty of his marriages vvith sundry vvives, from none of vvhom he vvvas diuorced, but left his first vvife Aossa, the daughter of Cyrus, alieue in great honour, the being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly proue that Hester was not his. Vvhereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the persvauation of Mardachaus, Ioiachim the high Priest the son of Iefua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim vvvas in the reigne of Artaxerxes, at the coming of *Esdra*s, and Nehemiah; Iefua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, vvith other his furious and tragicall loues, vvherevvith Xerxes did consume such little time, as he had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained no vnto the time of Xerxes, vvho liued but one and twentie yeares, vvhereas the two and thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artaxastia is expressed by Nehemiah. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seuenth yeare of his reigne (vvherein this marriage must haue bin celebrated) came not neere to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahasuerus, it is enough to say, that Mardachaus hauing bene carried from Ierusalem captiue, vvith Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, vvvas vvlikely to haue liued vvntill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, reigned from India to Ethiopia, liued in peace, vvvas contemporarie vvith Ioiachim the high Priest: and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seuenth yeere of his reigne; vvhich good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Royall feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzheimius, vvho adds the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same, and of Philo, giuing to Mardachaus eighteene yeares more than Isaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred fourescore and eighteene yeares in all, vvhich expire in the five and thirtieth yeare of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to haue bin carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian warre.

It is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, vvho from this time forward, more vvehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedemonians vnderooke the warre called, Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane vvhile the banished Boeotians re-entred their owne Land, and mastered two of their own Townes possessed by the Athenians, vvhich they soone recovered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Boeotians, Eubaeans, and Locrians, (Nations opprest by the Athenians) set vpon them vvith such resolution, as the Athenians vvvere in that fight all slaine or taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa tooke such courage vpon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, & submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, & ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, & Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plisitanax, the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, & burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Countrey of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeares.

After sixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Myleſians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc't to yeelde themselves vpon most lamentable conditions, Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their own wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoeuer had bene taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this brieſe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew brieſly the estate of the Countrey at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens, and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what searimes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

*G*reece was neuer vnited vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For every Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeelde obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victorie, to their owne vse and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preferre their libertie; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrey by perpetuall Warre. For, vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastered all, forasmuch as every conclusion conclusion of one was afforded hereforth much of some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betwene one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authoritie of the Ambassadors, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

The Lacedæmonians had liued about foure hundred yeares vnder one forme of Government, when the Peloponnesian warre began: Their education was onely to practice feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth, every one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine them in such manner as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparrell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of Yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Brieſly, they liued Plinian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference between these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastic in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, & such as would in cold blood performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme & assured, that sought honor & not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subiection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the town of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuentee hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Naue, & (assisted by the other Greeks) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes; whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, & the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of war against the Persians; though indeed they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue Townes, of their owne Countymen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breede contention between them & other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Platae repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise, for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

How Sparta and Athens entred into warre.

Neuetheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, inroached apace vpon their Neighbourhood, taking their their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Coryra, their Colonic which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Coryra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now howsoeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the State of Athen, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reuerled. This last point, they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preferue their reputation without entering into a warre, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparant, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing, for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how faine they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, & hauing the generall fauour; as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; & afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe first and second yeares expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athen. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrey people driuen to flye, with Wiues, Children, and Cattel, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neuer felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Plataea their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise; besides some small overthrowes receiued. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Gouvernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, won the Towne of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedemonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing wel that Athen was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these invaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Nauiie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skillfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Coryra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and hauein, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subiection, yet was not the olde hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauein, lying almost in the mid-way betweene them and Coryra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not onely their Land-forces, but all their Nauiie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well fore-saw, little fearing the grieuous losse at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauein, placing foure hundred & twenty choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, between the Iland and the Main. Hauing thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stufte, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the peece on all sides. But in the meane season the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the hauein, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke siue, and so enforced the residue to runne themselves a-ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to aduise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the town, nor the Athenians against the campe: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athen, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athen, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedemonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euē termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace. The Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendered vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their covenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereunto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now, said the Athenians, ye haue assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquired of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far ouer-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driuen to vse many hard meanes, for conuenance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoner to Athen, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them, the Lacedemonians were so farre from waiting Attica, that they suffered their own Countie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus, which became the Rendezous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

S. V.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Therefore they indeouored greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene merely through their default, that the Isle of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedemonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most bin aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedemonians, who not onely felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuine the infolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it onely a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnto them they compounded with the Athenians, they knew nor how to auoide. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a truce of thirty yeares well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong City, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring States, that the Lacedemonians could cuer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by waisting the Territorie of Athen with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not onely the Athenians should haue been brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sake the war was vnder-taken, haue bin so firmly knit to the Lacedemonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argives, to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, & meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet from any great harme that the Peloponnesians vvaunting vvhetherwith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them; yea as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedemonians were glad to vse the occasion, vvhich the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, vvhich vvvith much adoe they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedemonians should restore first. These had vvvonne more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but vvvhat they had vvvonne, they had not vvvonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from vvhom the State of Athen had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) vvhich had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends & deliuerers, & not compelled them to breake in as enemies. Now concerning the Townes vvhich were not in their owne hands, but had bin rendered vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, vvhich they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, vvhom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding what former articles were drawne, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things vvhich on their part were required; so that restoring onely the prisoners vvhich they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedemonians entered into a more streight alliance vvvith the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to haue succ for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betwene Athen and Sparta, did shew themselves plainly vnwilling to giue care to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deferring in the late warre, or found to trouble some, that their enmities (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) was little worse than friendship. It bred great ieaousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a coniunction betwene two so powerful Signiorities: especially one clause threatening every one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown vpon the Lacedemonians their vniuist friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely vsed the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnrefutable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreame) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedemonian would haue endured to lay down his weapons, & yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should haue bin so great, as should haue drawn that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall marke, being ouer-laid by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight, and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonorable ease: then did not onely the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities ioyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies vpon the rich & great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitytie, to do much, they conceiued a strong beleefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing inuiously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuy at the greatness of Athens daily encroaching the Lacedemonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did onely murre at the peace, alleading as grievances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependancy vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselves; feare of reuenge to come, working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argues feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their Citizens, a full & absolute commission to make alliance betweene them & any free Cities of Greece (Athens & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular business to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to leade the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to do as the most did. What inconuenience might arise vnto them by these courses, the Lacedemonians easily discerned; & therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedemonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should bind the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no diuine impediment withstood them. Herevnto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason & religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vnderaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to ioyne themselves with Argos, & caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta & Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sinceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedemonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans; these did firmly betake themselves to the Argues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did onely hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argues in war, yet rather the Argues in war than the Lacedemonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argues, as they had done: but the different formes of gouernment, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of inuouation, by ioyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This business hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomacke than force, but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta & her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seene the great aduantage which absolute Lords haue, as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it selfe, being all as free; whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedemonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panacie, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedemonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recouer Pylus) vnlesse that they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedemonians hauing broken one article of the league made betweene them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the town of Panacie, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the the Athenians. This was sought to haue bin excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (vvhither they had sent home all prisoners that had bin detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemy to Athens should nestle in Panactæ, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plain termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed such base conclusion as stood notwith their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Couenants of the late concluded peace. Heereupon they dismissed the Embassadors vvith rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Couenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, vvwhose Nobilitie, riches, & fauor with the people, made him desire warre, as the meane vvherby himself might procure some honourable employment; vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, vvhist the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendered ought saue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, vvntill they had first, vvithout any longer halting, fulfilled all articles vvhereto they were bound, euen to the vvmost point. This was enough to make them swear, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuey of their Citizens, vvwhich vvvere prisoners. But Alcibiades vvishing a speedy beginning of open vvwarre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how vvily the time serued for them to affociate themselves vvith Athens, vvwhich was enough to giue them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vvnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these suddain apprehensions of vaine ioy, vvvere suddainly changed into as vaine feare; vvwhich ill agreed vvith the great opinion that had lately bin conceiued of Argos. For vvhen the Thebans had refused their alliance; vvhen the Corinthians had fought securitie from Athens; and vvhen a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, vvvere cometo a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then began the Argiues to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vvnto the Lacedæmonians, vvwho needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and vvvere not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very vvelcome to the Argiues, vvwhich vvvere not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied vvith the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, vvetween their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedæmonians knew not vvhat to thinke: for vvell they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore vvvere desirous to prevent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more vvvas already done, than stood vvith their honour, or profit; others held it the vviseest way, hauing done so much, not to sticke vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, vvwhich vvvas more to be vvaled than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away vvsuch of their Citizens as vvvere best affected to the peace, vvwho comming to Athens, vvwith full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying, that their Confederacie vvith the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouery of Panactæ: concerning vvwhich Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued used the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such vvise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done vvwhich in reason might be required for making matters euen vvetween them, to vvwhich purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation vvith the Argiues might be called aside. Favourable audience vvvas giuen to this proposition, the rather, because they vvwhich promised amends, had power to make their vvords good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement vvvas dashed on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, vvwho, secretly dealing vvith the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, persvaded them vvwell of his friendship vvowards their city, & aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude vvwhat they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Community of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptory & vvyeeld to nothing, vvvhvst they could draw them to vvunreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleued him, & fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, vvwhich their double dealing afforded, vvineighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity, that vvvere cometo Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves vvith friends, meaning to draw the Argiues & their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, vvwhom a pleasing errand vvould very hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (vvwhose honest meanings had so ill been seconded vvith good performance) vvvere now so much incensed vvith the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong persvasions of Alcibiades, that little vvanted of concluding the league vvith Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile vvith them, that the businesse vvvas put off, vvntill he himselfe, vvwith other Embassadors, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades vvvas able to carry a vvponder of so great importance, vvwhen the Spartan Embassadors might haue cast the load vvpon their owne shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the grauity vvwhich vvvas vvually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a vvvit; and they might vvwell haue beene thought vvtruly men, had they professed themselves vvsuch as vvould say and vvvn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sowe message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Panactæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made vvith the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, vvwithout further delay, vvould enter into confederacy vvith the Argiues, and vvtheir adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but vvrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians vvvas suffered to break out vvwhat vvway it could, vvwhich to mitigate, they vvould doe no more, than only at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, vvwho vvould not seeme to haue effected nothing) swear a new to keepe the Articles of the league vvetween him and Athens. Immediately therefore vvpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league vvvas made vvetween the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, & Eleans, vvwith very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; vvwherein, though the Lacedæmonians vvvere passed over vvwith silence, yet vvvas it manifest that the vvwhole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short vvwhile after vvvas proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians vvvere in ill case, vvwho hauing restored all that they could vvnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that vvwhich did most of all disable them, vvvas the losse of reputation, vvwhich they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundry passages vvetween them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe vvwhose Amity, they had left sundry of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrari vvwise, the Athenians, by the treaty of peace, had recouered the most part of that vvwhich they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betwene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellowes had found businesse wherewith to fertile the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this conjunction. For, presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, & other people of Greece, began a new to range themselves vnder the Lacedaemonians, & follow their ensignes. One victory which the Lacedaemonians obtained by their meer valour in a select battell, neer to Mantinea, against the Argive-side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit. The ciuill dissension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betwene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so faire as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantinians to the like. But in short space of time the multitude preuailling, reuerled all this, and hauing chased away their ambitious Nobility, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, & likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces & readines for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; & the Lacedaemonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmity in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into tems, of open Warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight, and utterly dissipated.

DVring this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicill, whither they sent a Fleet so mighty as neuer was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, & furnished with all necessaries to so great expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe; for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vndergone, amongst the incensed people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedaemonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without help from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe City of all the Island, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worke on all sides, in such wise that their Fleet was shut vp into the haven of Siracuse; and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicill, so did they at home stand vpon hard terms, for that the Lacedaemonians, who had bene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly iournies into Attica, which hauing pilld & forraged, they returned home; did

now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Town of Deccelea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the City it selfe. In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backes, and at their owne doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another Fleet into Sicill, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which had neuer offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seem wiser than it was; which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound aduice, finding bad prooffe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusians, was finally (together with the other part of the Naue, which was there before) quite vanquished, & bard vp into the haven of Siracuse, whereby the camp of the Athenians, vtterly depriued of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flye away by Land; in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowne, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe wel deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pheidorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicill, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to haue made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazzard the ruine of his Country by the losse of that Army, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athens; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolu'd to condemne him, by retiring from Siracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said hee) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue care to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether hearken to suspitious and vaine rumors that shall be brought against vs; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to retorne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, & to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused, since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people, and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne wherby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, hauing no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the camp break vp till euen and twenty daies were past. His timorousnesse was cuen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, & the course of Nature, would be as vniu'st as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstitious of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retrying, the broken remainder of Craſſus his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, depriveth the Governours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vnstout men is the ready meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

S. IX.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Army, in Sicilia.

The losse of this Army was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little lesse calamity to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the City about seuen yeares after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience, others held out; some for feare of greater inconvenience were fet at liberty, promising onely to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others hauing a kinde of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolency, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernment into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocracie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this inuolution, being slaine at Athens, the Commonalty were so dismayed, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiesty of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obscuring in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in priuate among themselves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than onely to approue and giue consent: for whosoeuer presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquiry made of the murther. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authority, which neuertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his seruice done vnto that State was not growne to be the object of euill. But when it appeared that in Counsaile & good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens weary of his vertue, especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeelded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treachery, conueighed himself vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, and had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practises, wherein by strength of his reputation as the onely fauourite of so great a Potentate he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) he laboured greatly to reconreconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemy. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being weary of the tyranny wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure; and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their owne authority & the greatness of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their owne power, or safety at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry ouertures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the waivering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocratic, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the city of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which vpon iust ground the Enemy was much more aucterly, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunity to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope king Agis did sometimes bring his Forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Naue of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bin regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the City, or to the Countries neere adioyning, any terror of the warre. For the dissension within the walls might soon haue done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnity, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraigne Enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernment a full restitution of the soueraign command vnto the people, or whole body of the City, but only to five thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take vnto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldome assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos should be requested to vndertake the gouernment: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades wonne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile, made their Generall, and againe deposed.

This establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Warres. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrown at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards ioyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos, his arriuall with eighteen ships, gaue the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and vtterly destroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransome their City, & fortified Chrysopolis. Hercupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distrust of the Army, in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged & won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which eu-in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Naue.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driuent to banish himselfe againe; onely because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alciades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alciades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had fought reuenge vpon his owne City; now, as insured to aduerfity, he rather pittied their fury, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weak estate, than fought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniury receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alciades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victory, as to vndertake Alciades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, & better ordered than they had bin vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Naue, then did Alciades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellefpont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

§. II.

The battaile at Arginuse, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiuing many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to flic into the Hauens of Mytelene, where they were streightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessels, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginuse, where Callicradidas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preferred his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue bene expected, that the ten Captaines, who ioyntly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happy a victory, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forthwith called home, & accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken & sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answer, That they pursuing the victory, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindered the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had been intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserved of their Country should be ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the people's multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save onely Socrates the wise and veracious Philosopher, whose voice in this iudgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much adoerelieved by other vessels in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the people was ouer-past, this iudgement was reuerfed, and the accusers called into question for hauing decieued and peruerfed the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamy of iniustice; but the diuine iustice was not a-sleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The battaile at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian warre.

The Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the year next following, hauing scowred the Ægean Seas, entred Hellefpont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged & took the town of Lampacus. Hereupon all the naue of Athens, being an hundred & fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselves, they sailed to the river called, Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the river of the Goats; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Egos-Potamos; & thus they continued fise daies, brauing euery day the Enemy, & returning to their own harbour when it drew towards euenng.

The Castle of Alciades was not far from the Naue, & his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countreimen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, & making war in his own name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, & obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, & shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see & preuent it. For they lay in a roade subiect to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne wherthey might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had been more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Naue euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemy. Therefore Alciades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not farre off, or at least to consider how neere their Enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, & to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not bin for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall terms, or vterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Streights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bin rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauens, was not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who obseruing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp & down the Country; he kept all his men a-board after their departure, & the fift day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceived the Athenians, disimbarcking, as their custome was, & walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speed that strength of Oares could giue, to Egos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-board their ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the news of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athens as desperate, & made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, & such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in peeces. Thus was the war which had lasted seuen and twenty years, with variable successe concluded in one houre, & the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that the neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victory Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yeeld

yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set saile for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agus & Pansanius, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City, which hindring too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth againe to Sea, & rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Towns of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all promise of victuals, and other necessities, from the citie, & enforced the people by mere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long wals, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should be set at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoining to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelue Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

These Articles being agreed vpon, the wals were throwne down with great reioicing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens, & not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompened their former infoleny and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiving this, aduertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contriued, and (as now dominering in every quarter) soon effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, & by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they took was of the Thebans, led by Eparinondas, vnder whom Philop of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the City of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the seuerall Estates & Signories of Greece, were grown so ialous one of anothers greatness, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argiues, & Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her Neighbors. And thus all parts of the country remained rather euently ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had bin dependants, & followers, yea almost mere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

S. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enjoyed a long reigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short reigne little to be regarded) place next vnto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the the sons of Hester) held the Kingdome but one year betweene them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the History of the Persians from henceforth. by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a moneth or two, if not by surfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew vniuissly Bagoas a principall Eunuch, & would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire nineteen yeares. Amysius of Saïs an Egyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmly with the Greeks, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the fury of their ciuill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the dayes of this Darius, and of his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a Subiect of his owne and of the Royall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him, confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicily, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders & others, subiect to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell our well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being destitute of mony, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Naue, without which it was impossible to aduance the war against the state of Athens, that remained powerful by sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the Articles of the league betwene him and them were set downe in more precise termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre ioynly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the war ensuing (of which I haue already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians, he got Amorges a-line into his hands; who was taken in the City of Iasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuertheless Egypt still held out against him, the cause wherof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, & his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subiects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindefull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; & Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that euer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a ialous eye vpon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befitst a Subiect: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the coming of his younger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betwene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

S. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the wals of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Country of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were chosen the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, & make a collection of such such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertain, it was fit that such men should giue iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the City was to be ordered, were become subiect. But these thirty, hauing so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deferue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the City, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirty men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturburs of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without true trial and prooff had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their own company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedaemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behooued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedaemonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their own cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a Guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirty, that none of their misdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the City, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirty) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discouraged, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselves, and prouide for their owne security, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole City) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and giue vnto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not onely of their priuate enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that euery one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should feize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one man priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but haue the accustomed trial) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; vpon which consideration, he aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but euery man choosing rather to preferue his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neer him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poison.

S. III.

The conspiracy against the thirty Tyrants, and their deposing.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For, hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and and goods, & caused them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, & the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consulation, & resolved to hazzard their liues in setting free the City of Athens. They very thought of such a practice had bin treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventy men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasybulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territory of Athens. No sooner did the thirty heare of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further danger, assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedaemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormy weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the City, which about all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were increased from seventy to seuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off about an hundred and twenty. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirty had resolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an easie retreat, and saue themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, & wickedly (though vnder forme of Iustice) murdered them all. But, sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were teamed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, & brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasybulus had the better, & repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, & the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were depofed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet form of government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasybulus, & his followers, had fauourable audience, & a power sent to their assistance, both by Land & Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, & his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedaemonians. And here appeared first the ieaousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had bin the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedaemonians should annexe the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, & such others, as were like to giue cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some inuouation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were comming to Parlic, and slew them: which done, to auoid further inconuenience, a law was made, that all injuries should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully obserued, the City returned to her former quietnesse.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

S. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing vpon such termes, that no one ¹¹ Esteate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the Warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which hee had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generally, the Lacedæmonians gave a suitable answer, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himselfe, & the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue been the recompence of his desert; or that he perishing in battaile, ²¹ after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greeks the wayes, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignes, the glorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; & opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he referred to another generation, than to giue into their hands that mighty Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Parysatis the Queen-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, & ready desires of many principall men, had moued this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father as hath ³¹ before bin shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose disfauour himselfe might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the lesse, & hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, & all vices which customably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vsing by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might wel be thought that ⁴¹ Queene Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had vsed the best of her endeavour to that purpose, allcading that (which in former ages had bin much auailable to Xerxes, in the like disceparation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent backe into his owne Prouince.

S. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entry into the warre.

THE forme of gouernment which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their severall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meet, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vially indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his wil, whatsoeuer it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprize somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his own Prouince, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, vvas well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardise despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesians were about to giue vp themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preferue his reputation, and keepe the towne in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, ¹⁰ were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, vvith vvvas no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he tooke not only the men of his own Prouince, or of the Countries adioyning, whose liues were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of war, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, til which time they had secret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being ²⁰ thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leued before, he could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had invaded his Territory, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, vvho had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was neuer leued against the Roiers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause ⁴⁰ a king and of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

S. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came vp close to his Brother.

THE tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilst the King in great feare was among the high Countries in his defence, the danger hastened vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, & of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia, where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a bravery) fled a maine, the victualles and baggagers forsaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more vnlikely to make resistance, because they were preist to the warre against their will & dispositions, vvhheras his Armie vvvas drawne along by meere affection and good will. Neuerthelesse he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the vvvay vvvhich they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he vvvas driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his own great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such deuices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, vvvhre some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thanks, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, vvvhvher vvvere all finally perswaded to do as some had begun; and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seeke out Artaxerxes, vvvhvher vvvhether he vvvas to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an armie of nine hundred thousand men, vvvas not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, vvvhich vvvere very narrow, and fortified with a strong vvall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any vvway by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian fleet, by the benefit vvvhvherof to haue transported his Armie. I do not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, vvvhv who arrived not at the Campe, till fve dayes vvvere past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward vvvhom he vvwith-drew himselfe, vvver all made of the same metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes vvvas vpon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of his kingdome, vtill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he vvvas perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, vvvhv vvvhould thereby haue gathered addition of strength, and (vvvhich in the sharpe disputation of Title to a kingdome is most auailable) would haue grown superior in reputation. By such aduice, the king resolved vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded so that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the king hauing call vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eigheteen foot deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betwene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

The Armie of Cyrus hauing overcome many difficulties of euill vvwayes, and scarcity of victuals, vvvas much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes; and being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing bestowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beasts of carriage; vvhen on the sudden one of their Vauit-currors, brought newes of the kings approach. Herevpon with great tumult they armed themselves, & had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the Riuer Euphrates, vvvhv where they waited for the coming of their enemies, vvvhv whom they saw not till it was after-noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feete of that huge multitude, vvvhich the king drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approach how well they were marshalled, coming on very orderly in silence, vvvhv whereas it had bin expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies vvvere so vnquall in distent, being all embattailed in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as vvvas the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not vvwith the corner, and vvmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, vvvhv who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus; then did the Greekes begin to distrust their own manhood, vvvhich vvvas not accustomed to make prooue of it selfe, vpon such excessive oddes. It vvvas almost incredible, that so great an Armie should be so easily chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrary to their custome) to giue charge vpon their their enemies with silence, had not learned for it vvvas contrary to their nature, to receive a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, vvwithout abiding the stroke, or staying till they vvvere vvwithin reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and fittes (vvvhvherof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the quivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demourne of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as vvvere about him forth vvwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bin assured vnto him that they had not he sought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, vvvhv who found that part of the field vvvhich lay before him void, vvvas about to encompass the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he vvwithdrew with fve hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a Squadron of Spartans, vvvhv which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captaine thereof Arctonius, vvvhv with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hettvpon his whole company of fixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chace, leaving Cyrus vvwith all vnguarded, vvvhv who perceiuing vvvhv where the King stood in troupe, vvvhv uncertaine vvvhv whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I see the man; and presently vvwith a small handfull of men about him ran vpon his brother, vvvhv whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breast. Hauing given this stroke, vvvhv which vvvas his last, he receiued immediately the fatal blow, vvvhv which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vvnder the eye vvwith a dart, throwne by a base fellow, vvvhvherof vvvhv he had killed, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it vvvas vvvnpossible to haue recovered him, though all vvvhv which vvvere vvwith him, did their best for his sake; not caring vvwithvvards for their own liues, vvvhv when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Master vvvas slain. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthvvwith stricken off, and shewed to his people; vvvhv who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But vvwhen this great accident had broken vvwithvv the courage into the Kings troups, and vvwithvvly dismaied such Persian Captaines vvvhv vvvere now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it vvvas not long ere the Campe of Cyrus vvvas taken, being quite abandoned, from vvvhvence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, vvvhv which vvvas about three miles from the place vvvhv where Cyrus fell. There he met vvwith Tissaphernes, vvvhv who hauing made vvway vvthrough the battaile of the Greekes, vvvas ready now to vvwithvv his Master in spoiling vvwithvv the tents. Had not the newes, vvvhv which Artaxerxes brought vvwith him of his brothers death, bin sufficient to countervaille all disasters receiued, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes vvvhvould haue yeelded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrarivvvise, vvwhen he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him vvwith great slaughter through them, in such vvway, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his vvway vvthrough the Squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field gaue chace to all that came in their sight, they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in the reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces and made head against him; vvvhv who not intending to seeke honour vvwith danger of his life, vvvhv wheeled about and fled; being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vvwithvv a little on the top vvvhvherof he made a stand, vvwithvv rather in a brauery, than vvwith purpose to stand vpon these bold fellowes any further. For he knew vvwell that his brothers death, had soured his estate, vvvhv whom he vvvhvould seeme to haue slaine vvwith his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he vvwithvv thought that he might now preserve vvwell enough, shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, vvvhv who not meaning that he should abide so vvwithvv them, vvwith all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled vvpon the spur, so that none remained in the place of battaile, save onely the Greekes, vvvhv who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them vvvas hurt vvwith an arrow. Much they vvwithvv wondered that they heard no newes of Cyrus; but thinking that he vvvas pursuing the Armie, they thought it vvvas best for them, hauing

having that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to dine.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight, and how Artaxerxes theaine sought to have made this his side to nob him.

I T was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darknight with them, found their Campe spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satiate their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with Herpe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune, because he perceived that the basenesse of his people, & weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Armie, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they disputed with him: for his whole kingdom, wherefore he resolved to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had done: to which purpose he sent them a braue message the next morning, Charging them to deliver their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there upon his Mercie. It seemed that having good hope to have found their high courage broken, upon report of his brother death, but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greekes being advertised the morning from Artaxerxes, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, waiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer, they sent answer backe to Artaxerxes, that having beaten the King out of the field, and seeing none that durst resist them, they would place Artaxerxes himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, with whole errand, offered to the Captaines very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons, another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the king, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship, for then would they first know, with what courtesy he meant to requise their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Graecian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered, That the king having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, rather, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus that having nothing left but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying, This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his speculacion shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes and Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemed that Phalimus, being a Courtier, and imployed in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be cheit in his Embassage by a bookish disputer. But his wisdom here in failed him. For whatsoeuer he himselfe was of whom no more is knowne, than that he brought an vnpleasant message to his own Countreine, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Artaxerxes, this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprized by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having neuer seen the warre before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, being free from all those, and from greater dangers, than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their their seruice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the small answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the king good, as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I vnderstand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace; quoth this politike Embassadour: To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feed upon their Horses, Asles, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. V. I.

How the Greekes began to returne home-wards.

A T night they tooke their way towards Arizus, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled quer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in peeces; for had they bin kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Statists to draw in the rest. Arizus being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the kingdom for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue given it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutual assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworne, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, & tyred the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made difficult, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Graecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an vnknown Country, should be very carefull: but it is almost past belief, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to do, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day verily came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to encrease of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, that when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battle, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the dignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieue them.

§. V. II.

How Tissaphernes, vnder colour of peace, betrayed all the Captaines of the Greekes.

H Ither to the Greekes, relying vpon their own vertue, had rather advanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straights or tearmes of disadvantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrappe them, to the extreame danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement, knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countreine at home, would not be vnthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alleadge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, vvhich hath vvillemed me to aske you, for what cause ye haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties hauing sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the king to take leaue, and end all businesse, came vnto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, vvhich Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, vvhich alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had bin. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and sit still whilest the king layed snares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, vvhetherwith he saw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himself if he meant mischief, hauing power enough to do them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed, for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in success, as may fully expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lyer may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakness. But when Power, vvhich is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntueth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his own strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, vvhich commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captaines, whom he subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing traiailed some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greekes, vvhich were very ialous of the great familiarity, appearing betwene Tissaphernes, and Arius, Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their seruice against the Myssians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Prouince; or against the Egyptians, vvhich were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iust ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies he could haue used to bring them to confusion, without peril to himself, especially by by burning the country, through which they were to passe, wherby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For vvhich cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seeke by perillie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance: but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentlemen to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, vvhich of them had by secret information sought to raise dissension between them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceiued, vvhich great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, vvhither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had bin to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus vvvith other the fue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying vvvithout, vvhether they had not vvvaited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon vvhich they vvvithin were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forth-with certaine bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vvvto the very Campe of the Grecians, who vvondred much at the tumult, vvherof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely vvounded, informed them of all that had bin done. Heereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, vvho called for the principall men in the Armie, saying, that they brought a message from the King, vvhich Arius delivered to this effect: That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded vvith death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the fue Coronels, for detecting his treachery, were highly honored; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, vvhich were due to him, as hauing belonged vvvto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was vvell that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, vvhom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed vvithout speaking one vvord more. Clearchus, & the other foue were sent to Astaxerxes, by vvwhose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it now amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perdition of Tissaphernes, the reward vvhich he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince vvasted by the Greekes, against vvhom receiuing from his Master conuenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor periuie (to vvwhich he failed not to haue recourse) availed him; finally, the king was ialous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, vvho tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, vvhich made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice vvhich he could not do, was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; & so hated abroad, that he knew not vvhich vvay to flie from the stroke, all the vvorld being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, vvherin he triumphed vvithout great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischief vpon the vvhole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, vvwhose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, began to aduise the vnderunder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to be-think themselves of some means, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Soldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes what sooner might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken.
This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bin wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further among some plentiful Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy, and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were employed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had bin accustomed to the point blanke. By these means did he beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chase with that kind of fittie Horse, which being well backt with a firme bodie of footmen, and leaded with troopes of the light-armed-shot & slingers, compelled the enemy to lie aloof.
Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Country. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to do that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being nere vnto the Caracchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing ouer some high mountaines which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties, which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Caracchi.

ENTRING vpon the Land of the Caracchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were vnto way inferior to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and vied the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much vse against these poore trauellers, afflicting them in seuen daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Caracchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Araxes a great Riuier, vpon which the Greekes reffe-shed themselves one day, reioicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would produce easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leuied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionie. The Riuier was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers, the Caracchi, following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chafe away the Subjects of the Persian, and then going backe to the most deperde men, gaue succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Caracchi being lightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. It fell to Araxes to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are distant from the Springs of Tigris, though Armenie place them far more to the East vnto the Riuier of Hyas, in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Armenie Caracchi, as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon, I will not scruple to make a coniecture, which may shew the Fertility of a Crisitie.

For that Armenie, and the whole Nation of Geographi, add small light to this expedient, only of this last, I thinke it the same which Sallustius in Thyris, not much aboue the Springs of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Bardeas in Ger-manie, is a Province of Armenie the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Caspian did not find much more to be feared, than the Armenie which Araxes did divide.
The Armenie which Araxes did divide, was the same which Sallustius in Thyris, not much aboue the Springs of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Bardeas in Germanie, is a Province of Armenie the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Caspian did not find much more to be feared, than the Armenie which Araxes did divide. The Armenie which Araxes did divide, was the same which Sallustius in Thyris, not much aboue the Springs of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Bardeas in Germanie, is a Province of Armenie the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Caspian did not find much more to be feared, than the Armenie which Araxes did divide.

The Armie of Armenie, seeking to entrap the Greekes with foammes of the Armenie which Araxes did divide, and being finally beaten.

THE Armie finding in Armenie good provision, marched without any disturbance about fiftie or threescore miles to the heads of the Riuier Tigris, and passing ouer the same, they did so farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by the Riuier Tigris, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though some Persians and others think it Tigris to be governed that Country for the Persian, and being the father of Araxes, whose Court may seeme to liue bin a Scholke, where the Art of Philosophy was taught as Wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased; but not burne downe Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leuied an Armie, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Tersibacus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, & by a Soldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out, & coming vpon his Camp, did first fight him, that before the whole Armie could arrive there, the hour which was ruled by the Vaut-curtors, chased him away. They tooke his Pavillion, where in slides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse, very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the Springs thereof, trauielled with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Country, through which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of victuals, and of catraile, which in winter did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreame cold; they departed leading with them many bond slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Catraile) some Colts that were bred up for

§. XI.

The nature of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering upon the Armenie, and other obscure Nations.

WITHOUT impediment they came to the Riuier Phasis, where Araxes and the Phasis called Phasis and Chalybe were found. The Phasis is a Riuier, and occupying the tops of high Mountains, which the Armenie bordering

were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that wherupon the enemies lay, making vpon the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest, which caused the people to flye, every one retreating to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrey the Greekes did enter were the Tacchi, who consuming all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, untill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattails were taken, the people in a murtherous captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattails, which serued to feed them, trauielling through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living, who were glad, when after seven dayes iourney they escaped from those continual skirmishes, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence trauielling through a good corne Countrey, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Seythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adioyning, vied them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discover the Black Sea. From Gymnias (vvhich was the name of this Towne) he led them through the Territory of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea, towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bin sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Calchis, wherein stands the Citie of Trabizond, called then Trapezum, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Calchis entreating them with hospitality, were requited with the like, for the Armie having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrey thirte dayes together, forbearing onely the Borders vpon Trabizond, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Armie began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territory of Sinope, and there persecuted the same purpose.

Having now found an Haven Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to shipping, & change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherophylus a Lacedaemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibius the Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to imbarke them. Having thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vie them forth in navigation. Left all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land, vvhreunto the Souldiers were vtterly unwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrey fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, vvhich they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizond: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staid to increase the Fleet. After long abode, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Calchis, neere vnto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to imbarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armie took the way by Land to Cerasus, a Greece Towne, where the Fleet likewise lay. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countrey of the Macrones, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Sinope, a Greece Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezum and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnnuenced to Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Campe, who complaining of these dealings and threatening to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon. That were necessitie had enforced the Army to reach those of Cerasus good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to vvhich, if cause were giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answer the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cerasus to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke euery one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie, and how it was imbarked.

Hereto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnite; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable vvorke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrey, desiring of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he employed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not giue battle in ten daies: he therefore, having preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, some approving the motion, but the greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Hraclaea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should giue successe to the proiect. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vnderstoode to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Tras; another offered to leade them into Cherranessus. Xenophon who desired onely the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staid from departing his fellows, and driuen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood.

stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Naue whilst they were in good readinesse, to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, & signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, & saying to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to vvoke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becoming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corys, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, & peace concluded, vvhich needed not to haue bin fought, for that the Greeks hauing now their fleet in a readines, did soon weigh Anchors, & set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to giue the Army pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater vvas their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all; they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose fauour the well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedemonians, who were ialous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsooke the Army at Trabizon, flying with one of their two ships) or moued by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatened ill successe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour vvas laid vpon Cherisophus a Lacedemonian; It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yeelding to such tokens as forbade him to accept it; especially, knowing how well their desire, which vvas by right or by wrong to get wealth whersoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or Foe. Cherisophus had bin Generall but sixe or seuen dayes, vvhien he vvas depose, for hauing bin vnwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea which had sent presents to the Campe, and bin very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riuers, which would haue giuen impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea; one feditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somwhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the egories Country, victuals and other necessities could not be had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicus, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded; and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicus at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus

as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon; but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should faile in managing the busines which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their rauinous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians & Acheans; they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Aboue foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea & Byzantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred wherof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuier Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confinnes of Heraclea, & Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, sixe or fixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the country surprised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezous was an high piece of ground, where some of them arriued, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble & danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slept at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks laden with booty, tooke the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians & Acheans: who wanting the assistance of horse, & hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand meerly vpon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts & Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, & enforced to craue parley. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without with the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially to inceased, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiuing by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallies had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place wherethey lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowre the waies, the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible; whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within sixe miles of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would haue fallen vpon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon aduancing thither in very good order, to haue giuen battell, found that his deuice; to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they remoued at break of day, & perceived by signs that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which iurney he ouertook them. They embraced Him and His, with great ioy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should haue come by night wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid left he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and ioyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauens of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disioyne the Army, should suffer death.

§. X V.

Of diuers pieces of seruice done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betwene the Lacedæmonians and the Persian.

THe Hauens of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuice to haue fettered himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure: so long they were enforced to abide in the place till victuals failed, neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Country, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heraclians, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were ioyned to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neer at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Country lying in wait to entrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that surruied, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, & breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and vnurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; vvhich hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure trauaile, Xenophon with the fittest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this iourney his demeanour was very honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the Hills adioyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood (scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight vvell that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the vncleane returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to with vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by vvhich he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed vwith so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not suddenly be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, vvhich at good leisure gathered the Haruest of these bad Neighbour fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not onely suffered quietly to enioy the spoile of the country, but vvhich the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they tooke a great booty, which they carried away vnto Chrysolopolis, a city neer vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visite his Prouince, vvhether they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them out into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Riuers, that he not onely denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their liues to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his iniurious dealings, they seized vpon Byzantium, vvhich by Xenophon's perswasion they forbore to sacke; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vnderaken. Likewise it was the onely remarkeable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them aide, whereby to recover their liberty, & obtaine their request. For a power was sent out, vnder conduct of Thimbroa Spartzan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of Xenophon's Army, to make Warre vpon Artaxerxes.

IT seemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brotherland yet were timorous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care, that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon's Army had reuealed the balenefice of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disadvantage, then was all Greece filled with desire of vnder-taking vpon this huge vnwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the Ioyne forces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painful march of one yeare and three moneths. Neuertheless the ciuill distraction wherwith Greece was miserably torne, & especially that hote fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leauing it questionable, whether Agessilaus, hauing both the fame, and far greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly focuer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being onely a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophon's own iourney, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Canon the Briton with sixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

S. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Thimbro receiuing Xenophon's men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, vvhich did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corriuall thoroughly beaten, thought to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaued her selfe so well, that she not only was beloued of the people vnder her government: but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certaine Townes adioyning; and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Myrians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arriuall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to sifle her; and kill her sonne of seuenteeene yeares old; which done, he seized vpon twp of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, where by the wicked villaine was driuen into tearmes of almost vter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas; to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will of the Citizens, who were couetous of liberty) the Gouernour striving in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loud of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leaue to speake with him, and pledges for his security: vpon the deliuey of which he issued out of Scepsis, and comming into the Camp, made offer to ioyne with the Greekes vpon such conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently vpon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceiued that it was in vaine to strue against the Army, and the Towne-men, who were all of one minde; he quickly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few houres in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, & then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitour, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendered pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the good gods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene subiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the truce being recontinued, held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land ioyning Cherronca to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth; by which meanes eleuen Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Camp. Likewise the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seate of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vncasie to recouer all the Townes of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the war, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Maander, and not looking to haue bin so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country: when on the very sodaine the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discouered, consisting of Persians, Carians, & some Mercenary Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparant, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiuing the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parley; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tissaphernes might receiue answer from the King, & Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, & leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the Warre by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces received by them during the late Warres, when leisure was wanting to the requitall of such petty iniuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the City of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnity; and publicly whipt one of them, that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Warres: though little they cared for the liberty of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassalls of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first yeare an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the City it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to haue their owne wals throwne downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians & Bœotians, whose aide hauing bin of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victory; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes & Corinth, only security against Athens, but such security as was worsethan the danger. For when the equall greatnes of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the Warre to extremity, leauing the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuerthelesse, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

§. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the warre diuerted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successeur. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGESILAUS newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to ioyne with that of Dyrceillus, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Bœotia, a Hauē, lying opposite to the Island of Eubœa, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the war against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers; they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Country in a new warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his maine intendment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the coming downe of the forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjury deserued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should prouide victuals & other necessities for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to inuade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vsit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Meander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heauie foot-Army, not suffering them to passe into that Country which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoyle without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which means hauing enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted, he entred vpon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, and not only tooke a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without assistance of their infantry, he gaue them battaile, and had a great victory, taking their Campe in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succed him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perjury he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdom, even in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing posing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters will, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunity of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such means whereby the danger in selfe might have beene avoided: as not loosing to have warre, whilst by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agessilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enjoy their owne lawes and liberty, upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Army be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agessilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transerre the warre into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirty Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Agessilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his severall Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: & those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne government could be preferred free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall contribution to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad, and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so viuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provinciaill Governour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Country given in charge vnto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territory yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was careful to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sate still as an idle beholder, whence perhaps by joining their forces, it had not bin vnease to recompence the spoile of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

§. V.

The warre and Treaty betwene Agessilaus and Pharnabazus.

Agessilaus having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might have increased his power, and given assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad termes with the great King; whom he lost againe as easily, by means of some slight injury done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could, safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vnease to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had beene so great, that when he obtaining parley did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, which had been such, that besides many other hazzards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driven to run a-shore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Seas as farre as he could finde any ground, & fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having warre with his Master, they were enforced, against their will, to offend him. Agessilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would recolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time onely Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy, if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessary business elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty, & for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedaemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their vnthankfulness with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agessilaus meant nothing lesse than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a vyffe of the people, whereby the City of Sparta was not onely driven to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territory. He sent into Greece thirty talents of silver, to be imployed in raising war against the Lacedaemonians, which treasure was, by the subtile practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, & Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne a strict hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And lest this great hate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faine, & vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedaemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the renue of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adiudged vnto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or persuaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recovering a great deale more than their own, which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) required with an insaution made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes & Sparta; & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their suit; it being the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, & then to discourage their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to worke their own wills, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece; & hearing out of Asia no news, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countie about Phocis, & with such forces as he could leuie, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to recolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprize) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, & make a speedy end of the warre. The consideration of so great a danger approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what help they could abroad, for as much as their owne strength was far too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent 10 Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by public allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompensed with friendship lately shewne in their refusal of assisting Paulanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirty Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to do the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate & Dignity. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requittall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Paulanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates, Isander being desirous to do somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where though Paulanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to therelief. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Paulanias with his great Army did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreame danger; but their spirits were soon reuiv'd by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Paulanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed 39 out of their Territory; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driuen to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to helpe his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

This good successe, & the confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battaile to the Lacedæmonians as neere as they might, to their owne doore. Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe, was not great, but grew more and more by the adunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, & promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellepont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedæmonians, & the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives & Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken & defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left-wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battaile meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent out into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Isander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her old reputation, & scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions, as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vnprovoked had sold his loue for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Isander at Ægos-Potamos, giuing him the command of a great Nauy, wherewith he required the losse receiued at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Nauie, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recovering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; The Athenians recover some parts of their old Dominion.

Neithertheless the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeares the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Boeotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouer-threw; and by his Marshall Gylus forraged the Country of Locris: which done, hee returned home.

The gain of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, & retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the returne from the pursuit. Likewise Gylus was slaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Towns being easily taken, & as easily recovered. The variety of which enterprizes was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn by the losse of the haue of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; wherupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required only in scorne, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, vntill Agesilaus repayed these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driuen to sue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived, that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in an hard war at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, hauing lost their Fleet at Cnidus, they soon gaue care to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vse their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Go-bemours. Only the City of Abydus did stand firme, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellepont, in the alliance of the Lacedæmonians, which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet vnder Thrasybulus took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

S. IX.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

About this time the Spartans began to perceiue how vncasie a thing it would be, to maintain the warre against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not onely to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Islanders, & euery Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to giue all to them themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their severall Embassadors oppose themselves vnto it, & for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the fiddlen to an equality. Especially Struthus, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low Countries, did seek to repay the harme done by Agessilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Themistocles sent into Asia to make warre vpon Struthus; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre being scattered about, all the Isles and Townes on the firme Land, grew almost to the manner of Piracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Themistocles was slaine by Struthus, & in his place Diphridus was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllides was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasibulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surpris'd & slaine in a skirmish by Sphicrates the Athenian. Thrasibulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Alpendus. The city of Rhodes had long before ioyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their maner) an Aristocratic, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a government like vnto their own: which doing where more especiall cause did not hinder, caused the Nobility to fauour Sparta, & the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Agina roused vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Agina, & besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Islanders began a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteen. The losse of these ships was soon recompenst by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Agina, where vpon the Islanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the City of Athens, hauing but newly raised her walls; hauing not by any fortunate & important battell secured her estate from dangers by land, but only depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a Fleet & an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Enagoriss, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island lying in the cie of Pyræum, had ability to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that City did cause it vially to embrace more than it could compass; so the infoleny & himselfe iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farre out of sight, and to seek employments at such distance distance as might secure them from the cie of the enuious, & from publike iudgements, out of which, few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Sphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country well could haue spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauens. For Telesites, a Lacedæmonian, being made Gouvernour of Agina, conceived a strong hope of surprising the Naue of Athens, as it lay in Piræum; thinking a right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleepe in their Cabbin, or drinking in Taernes. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with merchandizes, many filther-men, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or foure Gallies, hauing sunke or broken, and made vnseruiceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom he liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellespont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Country into as many severall States as were petty Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controuersies betwene the Greeks, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne, the Isles of Lemnos, Imbros, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not onely compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Boeotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne City, and to dwell in Villages: alleging that they had formerly bene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as hauing bene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these courtesies the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their liberty; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would be vnable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

His last the Warres, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not onely command her Neighbour Townes, but was also become terrible to places farre remooued, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, Olynthians, vvh following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedemonians, to set at libertie the places ouer which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neereft vnto the danger of those inchoaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedemonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should giue it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion, protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subiect vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastic leuie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue fight beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phæbidæ, the Lacedemonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flauerie of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them, vvhich caused the Lacedemonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidæ were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the dedde was approued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedemonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power hauing strengthened the Lacedemonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, vvhich (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, & some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe vnto their obedience.

§. X. I.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedemonian Garrison.

After this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meane to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meane to others to do the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie vvhewerewith his Countie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for feare of it were fledde from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene the two, that soore found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes, vvhewer spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, vvhom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Gouernours, who were insolent & lustfull men, that he would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheered them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came that he could not make good his promise, vnllesse they would dismisle their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; vvh taking aduantage of the Gouernours loose behauiour, slew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedemonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison, slew the Gaoler, and set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the sodaine Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than in dedde they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discouer such as would be forward vpon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide, vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated in the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countie-men, but procured some Athenians to ioine with them, & thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Lacedemonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers with a toilsome Winters iourney, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrius, with part of his Armie, at Thespies to intell the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the Countie adioyning, and draue away Carrell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra, to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens ioined together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedemonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonourable rule that held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the best & wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but vvhich it was put in execution by insufficient ouer-weening men, did dome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vniustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phæbidæ, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrius vpon the Piræus. For, howsoeuer Agesilaus did spoyle the Country about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, laying to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Nauie, afflicting so the Lacedemonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good ende, which neuerthelesse, being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached euery day vpon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had bin dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a war, ynable to relieue their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affaires of

Greece,

Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it vvvas their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; vvho readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countymen, vvhat vvvas to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Athenians did soone agree; but vvhen the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians; Agessilaus required them to sweare in their own name, and to leaue the Boeotians free, vvhom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This vvvas vvell and truly spoken; but vvvas heard vvith no patience: For Agessilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by vvhom he vvvas drawn backe out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory vvvhich he had hoped to achieve by the Persian war, did now passionately vvvet that point of setting the Boeotians at libertie; & finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, vvho receiued command from the Governours of Sparta forthvvith to enter vvpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; vvvhich he did, and vvvas there slain at Leuctra, and vvwith him the flower of his Armie. This battale of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that euer vvvere fought between the Greekes, vvvas not so notable for any circumstance fore-going it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but especially, for that after this battell (betwene vvvhich and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedemonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation vvvhich had formerly made them redoubted farre and neere; vvhereas contrariwise the Thebans, vvwhose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to vvvertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such vvwise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vvinto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly endured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution vvwith a manly temper, vvvhich wealth & ease had through luxurie, retchlesnes, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

S. II.

How the Athenians tooke vvpon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hme arising. Epaminondas innadeth and vvwitheth the Territorie of Lacedemon.

The Athenians; refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vvpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedemonians; did neuertheless finely giue them to vvnderstand, that their Dominion vvvas expired, and therefore their pride might vvwell be laid away. For taking vvpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, vvvhich Agessilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left vvnprefect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens, vvwhere the generall libertie of all Townes, as vvwell as small as great, vvvas ratified vnder the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Herevvpon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their own pleasure, did (as it vvvas in despite of the Spartans, vvwho had enforced them to raise their town, rectifie it, and allie themselves vvwith such of the Arcadians as stood vvwith affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, vvvere distracted vvwith factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency vvwith the Lacedemonians, some to vvweaken & keepe them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantineans, nor take vvpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then vvvas an Army sent from Sparta, as it vvvas in defence of the people of Tegae, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agessilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the

the Thebans, and vvwere become head of the Dorians, Acarnanians, Enchaens, and many others; vvwith the power of vvvhich Countries they entered Peloponnesus in fauour of the Arcadians, vvwho had, vvpon expectation of their coming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agessilaus. The Armie of the Spartans, being dismissed, and Epaminondas ioyned vvwith the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia vvvas invaded; & vvspoiled; a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe it any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeares vvwere spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vvpon Laconia, in all vvvhich time the found of an enemies trumpet vvvas not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeares vvwere not fully past, since all Greece vvvas at the deuotion of the Spartans; but now the Region vvvhich vvwith Xerxes vvwith his huge Armie could once looke vvpon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemye States had dared to set foot on, vvsluing by stealth, vvvas all on a light fire, the very smoke vvwhereof the women of Sparta vvwere ashamed to behold. All vvvhich indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedemonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaves as vvwere vvwithing to beare Armes in defence of the State; & somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth & some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned vvwithout battell, hauing re-built the Citie of Messene, and peopled it vvwith new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, vvvhom the Lacedemonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

S. III.

The Composition betwene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans, vvwho againe invade and vvspoyle Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

This iournie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans; in such vvwise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, vvvhich vvvas to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities vvvhich held league vvwith it, vvnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had beene a composition vvwell agreeing vvwith the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it vvvas rejected, because the Mariners and others that vvwereto be employed at Sea, vvwere men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, vvwhereof the Land-Armie vvvas compounded, vvwho being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, vvwere to haue serued vnder the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it vvvas agreed that the Authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling siue daies, the Lacedemonians other siue, and so successiuevvly that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vvaine ambition vvvas more regarded than the common profit; vvvhich must of necessity be vvvery slowly aduanced, vvwhere consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, vvwherein the Thebans found their enemies so vvvaluable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Bithmia from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they vvwere driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, vvwho foraged the Countrey vvwithout resistance. But as the Articles of this league betwene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for vvvhich it vvvas concluded; so the example of it vvwithrought their good, by filling the enemies heads vvwith the like vanitie. For the Arcadians, considering their owne numbers vvvhich they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people vvwere not inferior to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment vvwith their friends the Thebans; and not alvvwaies continue followers of others, by increasing vvvhose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Herevvpon they began to demean themselves vvvery insolently, vvwhereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbors, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing bin made (vvvhich tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene vvvas not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans & their friends vvvas vvpon these Arcadians, vvwho relying too much vvpon their owne vvworth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

S. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian, with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proued so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoever they tooke in hand, and were become not onely victorious ouer the Lacedemonians, but patrons ouer the Theffalonians, and moderatours of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntus and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian king, to whom they sent Embassadours the great and famous Capitaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired, whereof two especial points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of Warre to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many weightie considerations resolute, to binde the Thebans firmly vnto him; iustly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne; and hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from whence though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprife, had not they bene impeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumely to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deseruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroad; whereupon if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauentownes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing liberty to all Cities that had at any time bene free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meane which the Greeks had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece bene so composed, that any one Citie might without impeachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satraps, or Pica-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia, humane reason can hardly find the meane, by which the Empire could haue bene preferred from that ruine, which the diuine Counsell had deferred vnto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting ting a fine body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space dissolved, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatics wearied quickly with the troubles and dangers incident to war, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his owne promotion with increase of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important, but for that it was like a sudden storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly layed downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Egypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention; much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enioyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were onely or chiefly Domestically, growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Quene-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had bene the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poison and mischieuous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, she thenceforth the wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the peruersion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine: That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adiuiced to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadours of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuitie, a long continuance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full securitie of danger from Greece, whence onely could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied by mortal men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had bene concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece, when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answer was made by the Embassadours, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles; not to swear vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to requier the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relye vpon their own swords.

S. V.

How all Greece was diuided betweene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enemie of the others greatnesse drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyn their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, & Acadians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities, either for the old reputation of them, & benefits receiued, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some, iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessity had made warlike; & many victories in few yeares had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus, (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her coniunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia: The Argives had bene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing bene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect & enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce vwith her vwhen she was at rest, and had leisure, to bend her whole force against them, but firmly ioyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against their old Confederates & Leaders, the Lacedemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, & the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these waivering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, & seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuerthelessse accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedemonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the coming of Epaminondas, who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had bene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion such as had least wil to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countreimen, as people desirous of innouation. This was done: but the vproare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for helpe, & withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedemonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. For bearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had bene accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now very gently yeelde to the Arcadians, that the

the command of the Army in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

S. V. I.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Certaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For, beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Ne-mea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Armie coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedemonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinea with all diligence, and to send for Agesilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good eapiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hasty aduertisement of his purpose to Agesilaus, who was then well onward in the vway to Mantinea, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly bene taken. For thither vwith all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could haue bene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agesilaus in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrivall of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinea. It was the time of Haruest, vvhich made it very likely, that the Mantinians, finding the warre to be carried from their towne into another quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their come, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whilest no enemy was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantinians (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their haruest-businesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By vvhich presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recover the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals, vwith so many of the people as had not ouer-deerely bene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantinea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous aduerture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwayes bene giuen to the Thessalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations, yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, vvhich had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but onely in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meate; and giuing a lustie charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victory a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Boeotians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedemonians and their Assistants were not farre behinde.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinea, having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolved to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subiection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece, and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the enemy, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deuicd him not. For with very much tumult, as in fo great and sodaine a danger, the enemy ran to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the war was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Acchaens, Elcans, and others of lesse account, filled the body of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedemonians, hauing by them the Arcadians, the Embozens, Locrians, Sicyonians, Aseleians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, onely a troupe of the Elcans were in reare. Before the footmen could ioyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were ouer-laid with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies offoot, which had bene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turne backe, when the Elcan Squadron of Horse came vnto the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With some greater violence did the Lacedemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equal courage and equal losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victory to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeares, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so fure and general. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so furre, as to make them giue one foote of ground: taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, & cleaue the whole battaile in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who

who may iustly be said to haue carried the victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is exprest from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowesse. This wasthe last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian Squadron, and forced it to giue backe in disorder, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, he neuertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, vsing against the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he receiued so violent a stroake with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the truncheon in his breast. Hereupon he funke downe, and was soone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his body,) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance, did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chafe, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this, he called for his shield, which to haue lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory; answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is faire time for me to dye, and withall sent for Isidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, He aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilst with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his body; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two faire Daughters, in whom his memory should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrey: for he equalled all others in the several vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warlike Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Prouident Captaine. Neither was his private Conuersation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular easie, and of much mildenesse: a louer of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie & pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of body, much Eloquence, & very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more been an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adioyning and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinna. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparifon made betwene him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battaile of Mantinna was the greatest that had euer bin fought in that Country between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour, neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militaries, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vnder taken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what he presently had, & none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius; Nebus, hauing retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue bene, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it self had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Armie which the mony of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country; though it seeme rather, that he grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vnder his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, vho vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vpon another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, pretiailed so farre, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. He was neuertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vnjust, and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne, with which conceit being transported, & finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans & their Allies, he did euer after bear such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meer necessity to grow war-like, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne grauity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundry Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his owne Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis magis quam paria; The resemblance was neerer than the equality. Indeede the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Caesar, whom he had enforced to take Armes, yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Government only being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfeited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the

Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece

being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, vpon the death of Agesilaus, giue vp the Ghost, & the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip king of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

reigne of PHILIP OF MACEDON, to the establisling of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

THE FOURTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great,
King of Macedon.

§. I.

what Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THE Greekes, of whom we haue already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vain contention for superiority, do still as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liberty, with as happy success as euer Nation had, & with no less honor, than hath euer bin acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a trial and experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported out the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of mark in the world, that they vnderfall, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in denouncing each other, when the falling growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, where with they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power & purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings & States, which late neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amynas, the father of Philip, so much weakened them, & won vpon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recovert their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophy to consider; That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood between them and this inuasion, than seek to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Græcie Ciuitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidit; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striking each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Orsius, or, as other Authors affirme, of Imper and Albra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians, and on the South and South-west, by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, & by Nation Argiues; who are listed as followeth. About some fixe yeares after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to leade a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should either leade him, or sic before him; He pursued these Goates to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscouered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their City without resistance, and posselt it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty yeares. Caranus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeares. Tyrinus followed Cenus, and ruled eight and twenty yeares.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrinus, gouerned one and fifty yeares: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Isidore, Theophilus, Antiochens, and others affirme, that hee appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Agæ: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his Line & Race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre, wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posterity of the Temenidæ failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty yeares.

Philip the first, his Successour, reigned eight and twenty yeares. Europus followed Philip, and gouerned fixe and twenty yeares: in whose infancy the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victory, they pursued the same, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recovert their former losse; or to lose at once both their Kingdome & their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, & returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Closarius the son of Fredegunda.

Alces succeeded Europus, and ruled nine and twenty yeares.

Amynas the first, succeeded Alces, and reigned fifty yeares; He liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amynas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, blaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amynas, and his Successour.

Alexander surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amynas, gouerned Macedon three and forty yeares. He did not onely appease the wrath of Megabanes, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giuing Ogys his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace; as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnit to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Army; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Archelaus, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twenty yeares. The Warres which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first fixe bookes. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young, and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell therinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cosen Germaine, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twenty yeares.

Plat. in Gorg.
Aristot. Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all means to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his father, and hauing reigned seven yeares, he was slaine in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Crataeus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Æropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, & had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil, for Æropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which he held some five yeares: so the same who denied passage to Agæfilus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Vsurper left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and hauing reigned one year, he was driuen out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very vnquietly) foure & twenty yeares; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus, incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two years dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neere the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe City of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: Hee had also by his second Wife Ogys, three Sons, Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Prothomy, surnamed Alorites, of the City Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much about one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Sphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leaue his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being inuited by the Aleuadæ against Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, hauing redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Country, with whom hee also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Prothomy Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof he held Macedon for three yeares, but was soon after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge; and saith, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Daughter

Perdiccas the third, after hee had slaine Alorites his base brother, gouerned Macedon foure yeares, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander the first did.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the second, the youngest sonne of Amyntas: by Eurydice, hauing beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had vnder Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeare of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourecore and thirteen yeares; and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was enuironed, hee tooke on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouer-grew his modesty, and hee was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall, the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both potent & actiue. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argæus; sonnes of the late Ysoper, Æropus; each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, hee bought off the weight by money, and by faire promises vnloaded himselfe of so many of the rest, as hee ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Mantius, did beate vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Country: Yet after he had practised the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a city on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus the sonne of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus lost, hauing the greatest part of his Army slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoiding thereby the present fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and liberty to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemency hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good succeffe which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leasure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with so prosperous successe, as he flew Bardillus, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, & thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc't that country, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforce't them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larissa, vpon the riuer Pencus in Thessaly, of which Towne he soon made himselfe master; & thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the city of Crenides (sometime Darus), and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entered into league with his fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the City of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing less than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground vpon the Greeks, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the tyrants Lycophron & Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his seruice.

S. I V.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second yeare of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Mantinara, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not onely teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves, beating downe their own defenses, to giue him an easie passage; & beating themselves, to giue him victory without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slavery, sauing the ritle and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proud by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece; in which, at that time, they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vpon a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians: and for refusall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accused to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cesar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance.

chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out a vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollon's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to preuaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thousand talents, which in those daies serued them to wage a great many men; and such was their successe in the beginning of the war, as they won three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long ouer the Rocks.

In the meane while the cities of Cheronefus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendered themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Merthone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That hee that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philip; After to Philip: for so he was called that gaue him the wound. This Ci- strabus heeuened with the soile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engaged in the holy war, entred Thessaly with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessaly; but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being present) were vterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessaly, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Boeotia, and with the same victorious Army brake the forces of the Boeotians, and tooke from them their City of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misaduenture, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all speed into Thessaly, there to find againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountred by Onomarchus; who brought into the field twenty thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army ouerturned, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thessaly, and Pheres made free as before.

S. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practices of Philip.

From hence Philip resolved to invade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedaemonians, they retrencht his passage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygis; but Philip's elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselves within Olynthus; & that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Iustine affirmeth. But iust quarrels are ballanced by iust Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might serue his turne, all his affections, & passions, how diuers soeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and therinto conuerted.

For he neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity; hee esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter: Nor any City or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, til he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne Walls, he entred their Territory, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate down before the City it selfe: which done, hee bought Euthicrates and Lasshenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Country and Common-weale, by whose treason hee entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitants for slaues by the drumme. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was he aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

Hor. lat. m.
Od. 16.

— Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit amulos
Reges muneribus. —

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates asunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention between the Competitors, for the kingdom of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Counsell accompanied with Piety and Iustice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdom his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian warre.

THe warre still continued betwene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Boeotians, finding themselves vnable to subsist without some present aide; sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Oebus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand crownes: but when with these supplies they had stil the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Boeotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandements in war.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, & so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Boeotia, where being arriued, Phaltecus who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glory of that war called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutuell slaughters had continued for ten years; and, besides the glory, he possesse himself of Orchomene, Coronea, & Corfiza, in the country of the Boeotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselves. He brought the Phocians into seruitude, & wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing vnto himselfe the yearly tribute of threescore talents, which make fixe & thirty thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of piety for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphictyones.

physiōnes which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

§. VII.

How Philip with ill success attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Permerio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolute to defend their liberty against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip late downe before it with a puissant Army, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to weary them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied not only from the Persian with men and money, & succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessity. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gaue them often and ready helpe; Philip removed the one halfe of his Army and besieged it, leauing fiftene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder take diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon hee made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, & that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions: Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusal. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mœsia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeces in the battaile of Cheronea, was chosen Capitaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among these Northern Nations (part of which he suppress, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was by his great aduantage inuited againe by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphictyones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans & Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissionians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolving vpon this enterprise; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other dissuasion than a mastering power could hold them. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march, the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as quick expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wan Plataea, and brought into subiection all that Region.

The rest, & especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storme would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (hauing drawne the Thebans to ioyne with them) to leaue the enioying of their citates estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold them either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deere. It is true that he could far more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat vnto them (with words mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Arifides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incourted, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victory that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations intertuent) into Persia, India, and Egypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to the end he might obtaine the Soueraignty ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Capitaine General against the Persians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epmionondas triumphed ouer the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignty) by the general States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, & contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and vnder the Commandement of Attalus and Parmentio, transported the same ouer the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the warre. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another conuertible riddle, as Craesus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitions desire to inuade Persia, abuse his iudgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatened, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he inuited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he receiued much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Paulanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly flattered by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to bee carnally abused by those base persons: this Paulanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, hee drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued fixe and forty yeares, and reigned five and twenty. Tullius reports it, that Olympias incouraged Paulanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly auowed by the honour she did vnto Paulanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

Now although hee were then taken from the World, when hee had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had scene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here.

herein happy that he liued to see his son Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe bin an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaiged a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it selfe, in competition between him and the sonnes of Alepus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the re-gaining of many places possessed by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subiection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and won vpon them; He left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne: For it was said of Parmentio (whom Alexander, vngatefull to so great vertue, suspiciously murdered). That Parmentio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmentio neuer did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to iudge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature & his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For, besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this fauour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfe those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadian and Nicanor, whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death, He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them, that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that was in euery mans owne power to be well spoken off; and this was shortly proved, for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to violence, that he was a better Physician for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembered to Cicero, and Gellius, and by Demetrius and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyaenus, and Frontinus, his wife (sayings by Plutarch). And albeit he held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his reigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof; for, Amyntas the sonne of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Aridens, her Vncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridens, by extreme torments; Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles). Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra, Cleopatra was married to, her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Andania, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before. By Nicaeopolis, the Sister of Iafon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be suffred to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Arctia and Meda he had no issue. He had also two Concubines, Arinoe, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagis, who bare Ptolemy King of Egypt, called the first Lagis, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Pithianna, his second Concubine, a pub-

a publike Dancer, he had Aridam, of vvhom vve shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

§. 1.

A briefe rehearfall of Alexanders doings, before he innuaded Asia.

Alexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, vvell instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuentene yeares after Rome was built, and after his owne birth twenty yeares. The strange dreames of Philip his father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympia his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, & that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three keuell victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, & might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbor-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recouery of their former liberty, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders young-years gaue them hope of preuailing, & his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to liue slauiishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his Estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe, & the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened vnto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions & bodily slavery, other than their seruice in his Wars; and vsed such kinde austerity towards those that contemned his young yeares, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, he made a present iourney into Peloponnesus, & so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Persians, vpon which war Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recouer some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprize against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts & imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind arised, for he receiueth aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedaemonians, had visited themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recouery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the deuice he vsed was more subtil than profitable; for he caused it to be bruited that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballles, & brought into the assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a-dayes defined by falshood & knauey) that deuised rumors & lies, if they serue the turn, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perillous summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Yeaters of such trumpery; and for them, fear vpon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly & famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But that cannot conduce to serue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purpoeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommeth the worst men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be receiued again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wife men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intrangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedonia, to wit, the Thracians, Triballles, Prones, Getae, Agrians, and other saluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not much other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, he made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greekes had enioyed it ouer-long, and looke too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander halseth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the City, & gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Grecians, by whom he hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would onely deliuer into his hands Phanix and Prothys, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in head of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philom and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedonia, and many other Prouinces, could eyther haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailable, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Grecian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleodem one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to beleue that they were rather mislead by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successeur. He also beleaghered the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Ancestor Heracles was borne therein; but all perswasions were fruitlesse, the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ratiued, he threatned to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their city so many of the Thebans as had escaped, escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not giue them in peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Cities, which perswaded this record reueling their Capitaines, yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to foreward the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Capitaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians beooke themselves to the seruice of the Persians, vvhom after a few dayes he inuaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians vpon the River of Granick.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being ready to disimbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waite in their own Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, nere vnto Troy, vvhether offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, he put to death without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by vniust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of God; for all that he had planted, was soone after withered, & rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traitorous, his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which he wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie; for Darius intituled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods; he gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuey him to his presence; that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Ethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Africa.

In this fort did this glorious king, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence foueuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, & brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their king were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe pikes, fwords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and Jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the kings who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their own fears and cowardise, which in time of danger had more power over them, they they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did iustly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prelium capit, ita formidat indicium; nam sciendum est in pugna vnum amplius prodesse, quam vires; As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one fears it: for we must wonder, that in fight it more auails to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than onely to haue rudely strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his Story, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daying to vndertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie; and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kill'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spythridates and Rhufaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body vpon a peece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men?

§. III.

Apposition concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

The winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines; they will soone haue perswaded themselves, that such an enemy vpon equal tearmes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsell, That he which resoluech to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted; and yet lightly some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie. Yea, where shall we find that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such as (to speake briefly) assist with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no security to those that lye behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The townes of Lombardie, perswaded themselves that they might enioy their quiet, when the Waikie Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French king from descending into the Dutchie of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountaines had made liuest of all other for such a seruice, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardie, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Tanrus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopylae, haue seldome beene attempted, perhaps, because they were thought impregnable; but how seldome (if euer) haue they beene attempted in vaine. Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylae; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Europe wide open; how strongly fouler they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepest haue many Fords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his owne bankes, hath also enow to beare his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by straining in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a Riuer were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had bene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, & not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleuing nothing could be hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Island. Yet the Brittaines were men stout enough, the Persians were very dailards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Granicke in face of the enemy, not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For, hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesians, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he receiued with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus vtilis clementia summa; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Souerainty, to haue the same of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Atletus, and by force mastered Italicius, Isus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that the held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her son and successeur; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he let the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a marvellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victory layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Capitaines in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celonas seated on the Riuer Meander, vvhich was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celonas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midus. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a funder with his sword. For there was an ancient propheticke did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the propheticke, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to clear the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Chio, and Ceos: the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Capitaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent thre score Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celonas he removed to Ansira, now called Anguiri, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Armie, and then then entred Paphlagonia, vvhose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained free-dome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouvernor with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

He had vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, vvhich heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this onely Capitaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of kingdoms and Empires, guided handfule of men against multitudes of equal bodilly strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearefull passions of his own followers into magnanimities, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue bin stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts therof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy; and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, vvhich the infinite Spirit of the Vniuersall, piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this king did were maruellous, and would hardly haue bin vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discovered the Riuer of Indus: as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountered by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Herby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meere length of tedious iournies could make, vverlike the Celestus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Capitaines, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a vvorke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardy & well-ordered State, than to tread down and vtterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vniueildy Empire. Wherefore these Parmenians, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, saue onely that braue Roman, Cesar.

40 Having thus farre digressed, it is now time that we returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror, who is traailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile, vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well aduised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaires in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall neuer be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves vvvith the purchase of glory, as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and silver.

The Gouvernor of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, vvhich were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began ouerlate to prife and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waste all the prouisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwayes to giue ground to the Inuader, till he found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes refusing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countreies. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while: from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Perseus once.

Xenxes, when he inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his kingdome. Pericles though the Lacedamonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazzard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne countreies, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when he gaue Cesar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharalia, he lost the battaile, lost 10 the freedom of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he inuaded Prouence, by vassing the Countreie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countreie, and could not be perswaded to linger the 30 time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon king Edward at Chesie; and King Iohn (when the Englisb were well-neere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue beene wasted to nothing) constrained the blacke Prince with great furie, neere Poitiers, to ioyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the Englisb burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed, his aduice, which told him, That the Englisb could neuer get his inheritance by smooke; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrant, that King Edward was vnto to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchie of Guien without euer putting 40 on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia & Paphlagonia bin wasted whilst Alexander was farre off, and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arseus, Governour of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, 50 of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bin maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue bin so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue beene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull trauaile.

But Arseus leaving a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoile the Countreie; or rather, as may seeme, to find himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather haue aduentured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would would haue beene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driven from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexander's coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arseus made all haste to ioyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countreie behind their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else 10 but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countreie (which honour they saw that Arseus himselfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaming after his Haruest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardice of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had beene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnnarlike Armie leuied by Darius against Alexander. The vnadvised courses which Darius took in this Expedition. He was vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, wife, and Children were made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

In the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Isfius musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Platarch at sixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than aman of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to let out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his own safety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire, 30 which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and fiue young-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeare, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-laid and garnished with siluer and gold; and then the Vanguard of their horse, compounded of twelue severall Nations, which the better to auoid confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: & these were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle; baies, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perwade them that it were great incivillitie 40 to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuosè induciunt miles, sed virtute superiorem alijs non existimet, cum in praelijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparrell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was per chance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sannites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware cyther to preuaile or dy, thirty thousand of them hauing apparrelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim crispis vulnera facere, & per pila atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fiftene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparrelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) & these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himselfe, himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not ferue, but they ferued their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same metall. The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sat, had a couering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the king was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his own person, two hundred of the blood Royall; blood too Royall and precious to be spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were back with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the king, which if he had meant to haue vsed, he would haue marshalled some what nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisgambis the kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fiftie Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously appparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had bin Comedians or Tumblers; for this troope was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of flight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the May-game King into the field, incumberd with a most vn-necessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakedst Nation of the vworld against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath bin v wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoyle and riches. The rich ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, & the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English nation haue attempted many places in the Indies, and run vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plate, and Pistoles; vvhich, had they bin put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Country, they would haue turned their Peeeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made vwillingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plenty is wont to flunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, do rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car nil in a rien a gagner que des coups, volontiers il ny rapas. Norman makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Counsellors, he vould haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrayles of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battell (which is indeed no-where wel described, neither for the confusion & hasty running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that three score thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there mis-carried but two hundred & foure score of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I do verily beleue, that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate & the basest of the World) had had any any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the kings children; had their owne honour beene valued by them at nothing, and the kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of diuers Nations, richly armed, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, vvell couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, vould make so little account of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and vvorle disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauiog so great abundance of treasure to do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him ouerlate, as taught by the miserable successe liketo follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth,) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should be presently slaine: vvhile he vv as a funding in the Tormentors hand, yfed this speech to the king, That Alexander, against whom he had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserved punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It vv as the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita for-mantur, ut aspera quae vtilia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares indge all that is profitable to betoo sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, et essentia, quae crepta consilium euanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Gracian Souldiers that serued him, vvho intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counsellors and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bin able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, vvnder their Captaine Amynas, held firme, and marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: vve read in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they haue serued hath bin broken.

At the battaile of Ramenna, vvhere the Imperials vv ere beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed, vvhom when Hen-ry Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not entire by their escape, he was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truely said of those men, vvho, by being acquainted with dangers, feare them not; Thay, Negle periculo imminenti, multi opus quantum difficile aggreuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, vvich, the mischise hanging ouer their heads, may bring: and as truely of those that know the warres but by heare-say; Quod valentes sunt et praudentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare, but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

The Gracians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counsellled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, vvhereby he might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once than might haue beene well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the eowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Gracians vvich gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite vvildome of God darst not vvork at vvares by

by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouvernours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Complics. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a streightned piece of ground, nere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrowen, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Griecians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristotle, but the Historian, that he embraced the Wife of the valiant Alcemon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Persea, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persea in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to sixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines, (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Ephania (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouverneur.

Arachis, Zidon, and Biblos, maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Strata was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asiathelle, overthrowen the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leuied; the Cassandrians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there, for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephelston, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Ittyall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, & quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had receiued an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more comefull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as diuine fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolu'd well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdain'd the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

S. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander coming nere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he took very thankfully, resuming them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seared in the old City, adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolu'd to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, to yee with the helpe of his Nauie which arriued (during the flog) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of fine and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diodore) thirtene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idol of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprife and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betwene the Island and the Main.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesus had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

S. V I.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laith the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuer of Eufrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enow of that nature to present vnto another. All the kingdomes betwene the Riuers of Alys, and the Hellepont, he offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own verue had posselt him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any, & that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdain'd to thinke of resistance in transporting himself ouer Riuer. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the king, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, I hat so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Githa faithfull servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone. He found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forc'd to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Babemeis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assailants, he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whilest he was yet alive, who being a valiant valiant a man as himselfe, diddaine to aske him either life or remission of his tounes. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector: It is true, that cruckie hath alwayes somwhat to couer her deformity.

Lib. 1. lib. 1.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, assured out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuites in their rich ornaments, & the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusall, flatly and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmentio reprehended him for it. Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophetic of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence forth could discourage him or feare him. He conseld to Parmentio (saith Iosephus) that in Dio a City of Adacem, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so perswaded, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imbodened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and inioy their owne Religion.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a sournie to the Temple of Hammon.

From Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Affaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the king of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man he had but the command of one Citie, and to the weakest toward the gouernment of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon; so foolish had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie lands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruellous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreame despaire. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what he pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Armie was cast backe, guided them out those pathlesse lands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomee, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the storie of Alexander, as, That an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Atropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrans made their defensue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies haue many such pretty tales, telling how they haue bin assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lady, & by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly beleue. The strangest thing that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouara, all the Dogges which followed the French Army, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had bene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triunulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperial Switzers vtterly broken and put to mince.

The place of this Idoll of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it to be by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom & the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, & the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacent; and on the North he ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith he) vpon the spoyle of shipwracke: whereas the temple or groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Ptol. lib. 3.

When Alexander came neere the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his madd ambition; who affected the title of Iupiters son. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Deuils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to say Opaidion, he said O pai dios, that is, O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare sonne: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spred, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Persens and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was employed against Gorgon, The other against Anteus and Bufris; and seeing these men had deriued themselves from the gods, why might not he? By this it seemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeed he made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to giue answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head, I see that many wise men haue troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who liued, saith St. Augustine, in Massettime) Ea que de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripserunt, non sunt nimium curiosi peruestiganda; vix mus non ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell began to be preached in the World, the Deuill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cesar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomey in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water; and at Noon as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon hee returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike vnderstanding that hee affected the title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saue good men.

He gaue the charge of the severall Prouinces of Egypt to severall Gouvernours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the gouernment of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank & degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Westermost branch of Nilus. And hauing now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phoenicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazæus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius easily haue repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waighy stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round & well polished by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the riuer, otherwise than by ioyning their hands and entering their rimes together, making one waighy and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deep towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the footmen were inforced to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moistned, and made vsueruicible by the Waters. But it was truly and vnderstandingly said of Homer,

Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.*

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of misgouernment haue beene subiect to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feauer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderstanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Easterne shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place, where Mazæus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces he durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forsooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue overcome. But it is commonly scene, that fearfull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all prisoniers a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue themselves ouer Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This, Mazæus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, leauing the strength of their foot out of fight, and far behind.

The new prisoniers of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battaile of Arbela.

Darius, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Asians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather serued to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Arriani hath numbered

numbered them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neere fifty thousand horse, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassalls, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or foure hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria, to haue overcome the few numbers of the inuading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indola, quam ars & exercitium solent præstare regem.
In victory; In euery battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Army after the passage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine preface of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Iupiter, they should all perish; For he not only inforced them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselves.

Hercupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine preface of good successe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small foole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious obseruation Cæsar made good vse, when he fought against Drusus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly lose the battaile, Cæsar forced them to abide it, though they durst not giue it, wherein hauing their minds already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Grecians were vnder the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory being obscured. This iudgment of the Egyptian Priests being noyed through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam ducit; Let not a Captaine leade his Army to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terror.

It is truly obserued by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, wee finde it in all stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Army, certaine letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed,

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again before the last triall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp & resigne all Asia the lesse, & with Egypt, all those Kingdoms betweene the Phœnician Sea, & the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranfome of his Mother, and his other Daughters 30.

thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his son Ochus in hostage: To this they fought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had, Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, advised with his Counsell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune, who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates & Hellefpont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, & the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himself a Successor of ablegance to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust & prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his owne flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one vniust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own naturall clemency and magnanimity, without all respect to their Master, but thanks to an enemy was improper; that he made no warres against aduersity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies; and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise & faithfull) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert force, but as a Traitor by secret & base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleue that he offered him some what in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, & not to receive; That the Heauens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superior, he might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

With this answer the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, & sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he neuer dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Campe by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terror in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witness his valour. But it was the successe, that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode; for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna milites validius resistunt, si cibo potaque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus males pugnat, quam seruiam externis; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight, if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these besike were of the European Army: for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, & Arabians; that followed him out of those Regions. He vied but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetoric; for by the two former Battalles vpon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animamq; victoribus auget, & aduersarijs auferit: One victory brings another, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from those that haue been beaten.

Arrianus and Curcius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valourous encounters on both sides, Fortune herselfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his reitrait. But, in conclusion, Curcius tells vs in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work, saying, That Ephesiau, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curcius) thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we beleue Diadore. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued: For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had cast but a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the banks of Euphrates, & had armed but fifty or threecore thousand of his great multitude, onely with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that river so easily, much lesse the river of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, he abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowels of his kingdomes, as all hope & possibility of escape by reitrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run in to from those that inuaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The reitriding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a reitrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoile & riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had beene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neere the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might haue brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it vnpossible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praeterita magis reprehendi possumus quam corrigi; It is easie to reprehend than amend what is past.

From

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Alexander, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendered himselfe, his Children and the City. Also the Captaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt frankincense vpon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered vnto him whatsoeuer was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captaine in great solemnity to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entred the Castle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand talents of silver vncoynd. The City it selfe I haue elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high; and on the top thereof being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitful trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princesses might walke privately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Army foure and thirty dayes, consuming that time in banquetting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of war which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected lidges to haue deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Montluc) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath been bestowed on euery Picque Baus or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foot had a thousand Souldiers vnder one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. K. Henry the eight of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foote and five hundred horse out of Macedonia; of Thracians three thousand foot, & the like number of horse; & out of Greece foure thousand and foure hundred horse, by which his Army was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, Deo quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agabam, Minetus, and Appellidorus; to supply all wants, at thousand talents: but to grace Mazens, who rendered the City vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagifines that gaue vp the Castle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Protony, Hierodorus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euleus, a City sometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulizes also, Governour of this famous City, gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassals of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperity, hot of his person, (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safety with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles he gaue to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobility of Persia would haue returned vnto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to to their owne Kings, are neuer to be trusted in great enterprises by those Princes that emertaine them, not eue to be trusted with the defence of any frontier Town, or Portresse of waight, by the rendering whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hence the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fontarabie, in the year 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazens might haue furnished the King from Babylon, and while he stayed foure and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulizes might haue holpen him from Susa; & while he feasted there, Tiradates from Persepolis might haue relieved him for the great masse of treasure was laid vp in that City. But who hath sought out all so friendly, so full of aduersity? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest; for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conseruation of their owne greatnesse.

The government of Susa, with the Castle & Treasure, he committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abulizes, who rendered it vnto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazens and others, in giuing them titles; but neither trust nor power, for he left three thousand and odd Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repossesse themselves.

It is said, that Charles the fifth hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the government of Marseilles, if he could haue forced it, & whereof he made sure account, told some of his secret Counsellors, that he means nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuelled from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those mountaines which funder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Artabazanes, who defended against him those streights, called Tyle Pass, or Sagida, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forced to save himselfe by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to couer themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that country, discovered vnto him, & came thereby suddenly in view of Artabazanes, who being inforced to fight vpon euery ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) he returned & gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Foure thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (asse the numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians formaimed and defaced; by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue become knowne to their Countrey-men, but by their voices, to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false hearted Grands, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receiue him; & prayed him to double his speed, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriual, and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bin layed in the ballance with Persepolis, would haue weighed it downe. Babylon, Iudaea, and Susa, were very rich, but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoyle that had been made of stony, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twenty thousand talents: He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians

Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, & gave the same formal honor to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abuluz; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus; and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitlesse & foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non illuc ire uult, sed non potest stare, Nec hath. not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his horse, & led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Captain, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow him, & that seekes wisely to preuent extreme necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fook, that make the vaunt of hauing endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Romane Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Cæ. 10. ligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carousing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne & all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was enflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle & City of Persepolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the persuasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, & thereby alien their hearts: For they might well beleue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession, in violentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it so fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. Hetherfore calls together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vied silence for a while. Ariabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could neuer be beaten by any aduersity of the Kings, from the faith which he had eruer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two onely, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouvernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vied, and

and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain preit towards Naburzanes to haue slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Ariabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Army. Patrom, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greeks, which had in all the former Battailles serued Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but he enclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks with Patrom their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnatural Traitors, he praye Ariabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base cowards, durst not vndertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greeks to ioyne with him, who had been able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man follows. It had been farre more Man-like and King-like, to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Ariabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a Slaue by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pity: no, nor his present aduersity, which about all things should haue moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it; for infidelity hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, covered with Hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discouered; & to adde despit and derision to his aduersity, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeem their liues and the Prouinces they held, either by deliuering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villany, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speede, and because he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horse back certain selected companies of them, & best armed, & with sixe thousand other horse, rather ran than marched against Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discouered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, & flew two poore Seruants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian sword.

Polystratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished prest with thirst, as hee was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beaſts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood: And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of his bar- borous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the Iume God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had de- sired it, but for his owne honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear 10 Crownes. He also, hauing nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace vnto his Wife, Mother, & Children, desiring the immortall gods to subsume vnto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus pre- sented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wher- with to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauels were neere an end, ne- ry man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth fulfilled not his boundlesse ambi- tion. Many arguments he therefore vsed to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedo- nians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits 30 of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foote, and Ampylas with fixe thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mar- dons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the riuier of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder-ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again and follow- eth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zudracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes 40 Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feast- ing therein.

Phuaphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best follow- ers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approued and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the rem- ainder of all those that had serued Darius: he treats with Alexander for their par- don, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedaemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. He was also wrought, (though to his great disho- nour) to receive Nabarzanes that had ioyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. X V.

Of Thalestris, Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons haue bene, and are.

H^{ere} it is said, that Thalestris or Atinothea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to vi- site him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtained) That she might accom- pany him till she were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to fol- low him into India, she returned into her owne Country.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time ra- ding one of his bookes to Lyfsmachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alex- ander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Ama- zons; and Lyfsmachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts, which to amplifie, Her told how the King had fought 10 single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the riuier of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleue & know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whe- ther it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndetermined. Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some mo- derne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many 20 others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of peo- ple. Julius Solinus seates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuier Thermoodon; the other, neere the Cas- pian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; which the people call Sauromatidas. 30 The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Va- dianus, who hath commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny telvs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandicans, or Padicans, so called after 40 Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian af- firms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

*Medis leuibuss, Sabais
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumq, sub armis, Barbarie pars magna facer.*

Claudian lib. 19.
Proserpine.

Ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, reignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than 50 those which kept the banks of Thermoodon, a riuier falling into the Euxine Sea, neere Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels vs that the Scythians call Oenepatus, which is as much, as Viricides, or Men-killers. And that they made incu- sion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, & burnt the Temple of Diana, Manetho & Auenti- nus report, which they performed forty yeares after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Aeneiad. lib. 3.

Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the Riuier of Thermoodon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with diuers Nations, & of their ouerthrow.

L. 23. c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theſeus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Histori- ans, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Theſeus, though some affirme, That Theſeus himselfe got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gela and Lclages once a yeare, Nations inha- biting between them and the Albanians.

But

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the year 1542. (vpon which riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Vrichus Schmidel, that in the year 1542. when he sailed vpon the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breasts, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the year, when they feast & accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Momotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered by me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxury: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Perspolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much ouer-wrought his vertue, as he accompted clemency to be but basenesse, & the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore & deiected humour, rather becomming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the World could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground & adore him; he wore the robes and garments of the Persians, & commanded that his Nobility should doe the like: he entertained in his Court & Camp, the same shamelesse rabble of Courtians and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, & imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, & detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he serued, detesting the vices of the inuaded, assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he professeth (which how Idolatrous fouler it were, could not be so fearful vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and nearest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many traualles, more impouertised in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; & that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so refused, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgments he was most ialous, and making it knowne to the Army, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called to himselfe Artaxerxes, & that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Army seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he, together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue proued most most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull traualles, and with their blood, than in the kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happy temeritie ouer-come all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernment ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebelle, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, won the passage ouer an high and vnaccessable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirteene thousand foot. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoake, forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by anyron chaine, & a waighty stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves with their plate, mony, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arriuall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie-people, vvhich did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Borlows also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margrita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behinde him; but the smoake being timelyly dispersed, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of fixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hiu.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

ALEXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria; to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Satibarzanes, but in the end he receiued the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fixe thousand and fixe hundred foot, and nere fixe hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, & takes the way of Hircania; from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaine Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimmus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimmus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to feccie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if he had bin won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the business, he was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimmus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vpon them, Nicomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this Traitor Dimmus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole business, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do;

but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This, his coldnesse bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betwene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to haue bin in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion, which his silence might iustly breede. His answer vvas, That vvhhen the practise was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he iudging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, untill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Armenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, & made his enemies his Iudges. Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer find a better occasion to oppresse his priuate enemy, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good;
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with power and Princes ieaousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent:
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vnjust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfull ft vnder taking with distrust,
So that base villeniesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the king following the aduice of Craterus, had reloued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the samenight in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out vpon the king in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were viced against him by Alexander himselfe (for the kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon: He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but with all grieve for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in dispight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Heclor and Mitranor hauing bene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppress with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he fankte vnder those that led him. In the end, the king asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the king to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hereof the king made his aduantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdaind the language of his owne Country, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the king, who had so sharply inueyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For not his enemies onely were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, hauing discouered the kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselves, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he vsed in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus, desired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to adventure himselfe with ineane and base Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the party, and haue encouraged Nicomachus. Indeece, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though he had neuer dealt vwith him in any such practise. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the king, there vvas not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that aduersity being seldome able to beare her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deserting it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of resistlesse and vnnaturall torments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephesiton, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe, being perswaded that they would haue slaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and bloud, he was forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur: & innocens suis pro incerto scelere certissimus pœna: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur? what shall we say it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is uncertaintie; not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had bene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had bene put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolus, who afterward conspired against him, made the kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greatest motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, (speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitatis minime humanum malum est, indignum amitti animi; feruoris ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abieciolo homine, in siliestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice; it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is euen a beasts rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a sauaige Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, vvwhether the confession that Philotas made, vvwere to giue end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that deny falsly, cometo one and the same end. Now, vvwhile the kings hands vvwere yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lynceles, sonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had bene three yeares in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there vvwere that vvwere suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the kings fauour, as by louing those whom the king fauoured; they vvwere dismissed. But Parmenio vvvas yet liuing; Parmenio, vvwho had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had deprest Attalus the Kings enemy; that had alwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, for it was vnlkely that he would haue dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, hauing now liued threecore and ten yeares / yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posselt themselves of his affection; it was resolu'd that he should be dispatcht. Polydamus was employed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militis domi, clauis, Mula sine Rege propter; Rex sine illo nihil magne reiefferat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

§. XV III.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araians or Emergians; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouvernour, then he subdued the Atacians, & left Menon to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons & Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age and with traualles of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, he subdued againe by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigins. And now he resolu'd to finde out the new king Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouvernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. Hee found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forc't to few together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie, which Bessus might easily haue distrust, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army as far off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had stiled himselfe King, he durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neere vnto him, and whom hee most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moued both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain closed about his necke like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Town inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece; whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly after they had receiued him with great ioy, he put to the sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assailed his Campe, in repelling whom he received a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Peropodinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threecore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Amians) vvho offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced & rased, killing all therein. At one of these he receiued a blow on the necke, which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria, threecore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seutene daies after the wals built. The building of this Citie is said to haue bin occasion of a war betwene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified for purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for very feare, should neuertheless make such peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with vvhom he could nor meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer, which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runs betwene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarchand; But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is nere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and ynknowne. So that Alexander had (before Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swim ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais; vvhich (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he liued in Asia in that traualle.

Wherefore it is enough to beleue, that the Asiaticke Scythians, making some offer, to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, vvith vvhat was like to giue some hinderance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defenceless Armes, easily chased some ten or twelue miles, which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time hee were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that wast Country, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set vp a monument.

Threecore of the Macedons are said to haue bin slaine; and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight; which might easily be in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell; yet Cesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath bene to inquisitive into the greatnesse of their own successe, that writers haue bene able to deliuer such particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe vvhat vve finde, especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number vvich the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number vvich they slew (nothing not vvithstanding in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnesse of Alexander) & the little bootie that was gotten, doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repetition of a few rousing Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Alans), vvithout any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Seythians bordering vpon Tascher, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine; to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria; Alexander kills, burns, & lays waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Gouernour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lydia, and Syria; with all which, & the old Armie, he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built fixe Townes neere each other for mutual succour, But he findes a new start-vp-Rebell called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong picke of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred young men, & promised them valents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandment; Hencupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place, who being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vpon the hill simply to Alexanders murther, and was (with all his kindred) scotched and ensigned to death, which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue bene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine; hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Island of Sark, ioyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maries time surprisid by the French, and could neuer haue bene recouered againe by strong hand, hauing castell and corne enough vpon the place to feed so many men as will stand to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Tackles; Y^e by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, i^e vally in this great neede, He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie this Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle, offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come ashore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yeeked. Then did the Flemings para Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkeffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Marquebusses; The French receiued them at their landing, and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vnto the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the *French*ooke the Flemish Boat & rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, & what else they pleased; but being entered, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they ran to the Cliff and cry to their Company aboard, the Fleming to come to their succour; but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeeked themselves into the place. Thus a Fox-tail doth sometimes helpe wel to picke out the Lions skin, that else would be too short.

After these Sogdian and Seythian Waues, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other cruellous matters, and that he committed the Government of Macedonia, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he oblied to the King the death of Parmenio, and desired the Oracle of Hannun for for therein he toucht him to the quicke, the same being deliuered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deferred as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular saued his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the griefe whereof he tare his own face and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischieses are not attended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & inuenit, & deiecit; abstinentia uero canitibus delectandam remouet; ubi possedit animi nimia vis, vni, quicquid mali latet, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit: Drunkennesse both kindles and layes open euery vice, it remooues out of the way that shame which giues impedimento vnto badde attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkennesse indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dabans also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-Rebels, disposed of the Prouinces which he past over, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Traine. From hence he invaded the Sacani, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territorie of Coborians, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feared him greatly, & presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vse any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards Babylonia, hauing so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo, whom Calisthenes opposed; For, among many other honest arguments vsed to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one yet liuing in this world: He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a crowning feast) but that, for the more than many acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be recharged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that he had betrayed the King to others; but because he neuer would condescend to betray the king to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the king made by one Hermolus and others (which they contest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or trial, to be torne asunder vpon the racke: This deed vnworthy of a king, Seneca thus censureth. Hic est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellicum fortitudo redimet. Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa milia: opprimam Calisthenem: Quoties dicimur, Occidit Darius: opprimam, & Calisthenem. Quis id vitium erit, Omnia Oceanotenus vici, ipsum quoque rebaunt non elapsibus, & impetibus angulo Thracie? Quae ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Dabim Regumque exempla transire, ex his quae fecit nihil tam vngnam esse quam fecit Calisthenes; This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor fortitude of his in waere shall euer be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew Calisthenes: when it shall be said, He slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes; when it shall be said, He wasne able to passe as the very Ocean, thereon also he aduentured with vnusall Numbers, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient: it shall be said withall; But he killed Calisthenes. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Callisthenes to his reproach.

S. X. X.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battaile betwene him and Porus.

With the Armie before remembred, of one hundred & twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits & Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten daies together. Now when he had drunke his fill, he went on towards Dadula, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victualls failing, he diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cenon, another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazaga, which had in it 3. hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yeelded vnto him by Clepe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephesion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrival, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, loone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and five and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this division to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. He presented Omphis with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coyne; which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that he was courteous of glory, not of gold, he gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, hauing heard that Alexander had received his enemie Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betwene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, he thought it an ill match vhen Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his kingdom, there to doe him homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe ouer the River Hydaspes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore & ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had scene India. The River was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacite. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the River with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, lets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troopes and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleues, that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had sent it. But

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaile him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vp the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc't to recoile. Ptolomie moves forward with horse of his Armie, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephesion, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenon or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Eumenes, he directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried vpon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beafts the Macedonian foote were most offended, but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long & strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them as being enraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foot that followed them: In the end, and after along and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northerne Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countie people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he received his estate with a great enlargement.

S. X. X I.

How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauielles: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betwene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his falling downe the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleue, till our own experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be scene betwene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandevile, who died in the yeare 1372. and had scene so much of the World, and of the East India, we accepted the greatest fabler of the World, yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillemus in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence, Guiclin Disc.
For an honorable memoire of his Excellencie, saith Guichardine. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acسفines, and the rest, fall into the maine stream, are now posselt by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlaine, who commands all that tract betwene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeare 1609. and some of the company travelled ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionisopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they inuadited to subiect to them the Oxydrace, a people inhabiting betwene the Rivers of Hyphasi and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, haue had the vse of the Canon many hundreds of yeares since, and euen since their first ciuilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexander.

Alexanders time. But Alexander pierc'd not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing already ouer-wearied his Armie, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer Ganges, was the powerfullst king of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great Deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many per-swasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise deuised a prettie trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armourers & Brides about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iourneys end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing (saue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was).

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acefiner, and there determined to set vp his fleet, where Acefiner and Hydaspis incounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicea, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fixe and twenty thousand Armourers, garnished with siluer and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wan many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Beniu of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, he past downe the Riuer with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriual of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. He feasted these Embassadors vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggones, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants wherof fought against him with poysoned swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward king of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden, shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after he had a few daies obserued well the course of the Sea, he past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Emphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixt Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels, in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were vsed therein, and other the marvellous prouisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this riuer, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eightene daies march from thence recovered Cedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such

miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

Of Alexanders Rites, Crueltie, and death.

From Cedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, he gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hatchall enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie, For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Alpastes one of his Princiall Generalls he commanded go: be slaine, so as neither did the excessse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie binder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of fixe thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had bin employed in the killing of Parmanio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, that Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them employed, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an land rich in gold, and of other strange things; wherupon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Emphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquira: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagon, an Emuch in especial fauour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certaine look fellows to witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which he was condemned to die; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Casperas (saith Curtius) esse precepta representanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda, sic began head-longly besed blood, and to beleene false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when he had liued threecore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrey, being an Indian, or sought to preuent the griefe and incommode of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughters, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Epheslion, and fourecore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand young souldiers, out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, hauing lawfully consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fixe thousand Talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers; but he was reioiced in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly reioiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet he sent commandement, that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they reloued, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedonia all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the trauell of War, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He vsed many Orations to pacifie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are euaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, vvhich Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelie, and sent him to many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, he would haue cast some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remooue, than to haue imployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end: For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though ialous, doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of kindly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearful vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Meditia to settle things there, where Ephesion, whom he fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse, hangs his Physician, and bestowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if we beleue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him payson; Thissalus (vvhich was of the conspiracie) hauing invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, he quieted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World haue seldome found good, by making their Ministers ouer-great; and thereby suspitious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The onely restorative, indeed, so that strenghtens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent, so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may be that Antipater hauing commanded two or three kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cesar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gauls, where he vtterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, hauing bin so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the king had resolved to haue giuen him some other great gouernment in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoeuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanitie to be esteemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkenesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should doe when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cesar found iust cause to deride him, as if the well-gouerning of so many Nations and kingdomes, as he had already conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his braines withall. That he was both learned and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Aduancement of Learning, hath proued it sufficiently. His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which Seneca

For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition to be himselfe, not much to be admired; For he was resolved that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himselfe. Surely of aduenturous natures were to be commended his valour, should hee conuince that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeues, Ruffians, and mad Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are imployed for the seruice of our Kingdomes and Common-weales.

against Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to haue bene acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbad the reign of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deferring to be laid in balace against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them: besides the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, & Aridaus his late brother (son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Berytus before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspicion, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vncapable of the Souerainty: Aridaus (besides his bastardy) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsaillors hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deciding what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who reiectd all mention of the halfe-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomy was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing fled the company of Arifinus Ptolomy's mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with childe. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to worke his own fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with submission to one, deferring regard by his blood, and trust for his euen carriage, or whether he desired onely to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe, had all been giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place indeed, though not in fortune as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomy had conceiued the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such King as Aridaus, no wiser than the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take cheere by the plain dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to worke: so was it like to be handled with Ptolomy & the rest, when Arifinus, another of the Captaines, after prodding many words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he deliuered his ring: It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: every one being vncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not be of the last, urged Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall blood; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephesius a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his prime valour. But very fairly he was: which quality (ioyned with good fortune) carried a shew of

Maiesty: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-weaning did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Arifinus, he would needs counterfeit modesty, thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that fainteth himselfe a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager a man by nature enuious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas, tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly enuighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoile thronged about Meleager.

S. II.

The Election of Aridaus, with the troubles there about arising; the first diuision of the Empire.

During this vp-roare, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager hauing withdrawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not refuse what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Pythion, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to claime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonnatus his Protection. But this childe was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Pythion vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with sixe hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and enforced them to accept Aridaus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonnatus, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion, that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauity, that they departed honeste than they came; being sorry for their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the Campe was in an vp-roare; which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renewed out of their pity that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonnatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing betwene

the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider; That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery looked vnder their great facility. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time; but no longer now did the same heart giue it life, and windy spirits they were which moued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager, who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as aduinity done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischieuously laid. Had Meleager giuen way to feditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of dissension, & thereby with a publike approbation might haue bin cut off, as hauing often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formally, but more speedy way. This kinde of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their quality set in array apart from others; as if they had bene of sundry sorts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish as by way of exercise according to the direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage, and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discouraged no lasting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the viter confusion of his enemies. For Arvidus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before, he sought the death of Perdiccas at the mitigation of Meleager: now hee rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what maner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leauing to Arvidus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body hauing bin seven daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, so how great sooner the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Arvidus: one of the Captains, who was two yeares preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarces of his friends being layed in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria; & a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

W Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater & Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferior to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were buised in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more brauely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, & therefore thought so to provide, that in euery City he would haue a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wan by this proud iniunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beate themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leophanes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leuie an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leophanes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certain newes were brought of Alexanders death; at which the City of Athens declared it selfe, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leophanes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming) in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their desires at a rate off, which deceiue all mortall wisdome, euen when they seem neere at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence, & to succeed Antipater in the gouernment of Macedon and Greece. The suspitions were strong that he had a priuy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better, which was, That Antipater should be sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the young Souldiers, newly to be leuied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympia: and would sometimes giue out speeches, testifying his owne ialousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted euen lewd gouernment) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Vice-roy ten yoyers in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuy of a Court, wherein they had bene his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, giuen by his sonne Isolus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunity had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his son Cassander: great cause of much feare he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neere, solicited solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse; which Muste was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Asia. The Theſſians indeed who had long stood firme for Philip & Alexander, who also were the best Souldiers of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Theſſaly trie the fortune of a battaile with Leothenes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leothenes had of Athenians, Aetolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians; of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Theſſalians had resolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia; which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to beare out a siege. Thither did Leothenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon refusall close vp the Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will we leaue him for a while, trauiailing in the last honourable enterprife that euer was vnderaken by the great City of Athens.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Aridens living vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcom to any whom he should visit in his gouernment. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that valtered condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue bin. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely fought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not some what narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, & tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) beene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fallall Period of so greatain Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater businesse wherin to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest, & for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of sure retreat, vnder the gouernment of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the victory, and therby the whole kingdome. But with much cruelty did he vse the victory: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon; and so deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had comitted to Pythion, rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greeks, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their vnpleasant habitations, & thered people people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seek vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his, Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythion Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vn certaine was the victory it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heate of the fight (which was vely doubtfully) retire without necessity to a hill not farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gaue the day to Pythion: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and liberty, vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirtene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse wherof Pythion might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, leuiued; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselves; leauing Pythion as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had faire leasure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded, will appeare when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

S. V.

The proesse of the Lamian warre.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leothenes, and would haue yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldome limit their desires. Leothenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering warre, the Aetolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or hauing businesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fallly out vpon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slaine, and Leothenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsd into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus, who was neereest at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field about foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the gouernment of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, whether leuiued out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Army, it is vn certaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the iohrny into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe City of Macedonia, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife, which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antipater, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leofthenes, hearing of his approach forooke the siege of Lame, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Theffalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued for: for he was a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Theffalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly was driven into a marshy peece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battell, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing futable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betooke themselves to high grounds, vsnt for seruice on horse backe, and so abode in the fight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Campe, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage; which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the Enemy to be vanquished. This wretchednesse (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable, seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captiuitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could be deliuered, vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Army hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and coming into Theffaly, ioynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioynd in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in foote eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipater labour to auoid the necessity of a battaile, vntill such time as the Towns confederate, should returne vnto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazzard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Theffalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great vse made: For the Greeks, as not subiect vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euery one desirous to preserve his owne estate, and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtil Artificer, and well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuice was so apparant, that it was reiected, the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their Assitants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Townes in Theffaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§ VI.

§. VI.
Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

The Theffalians falling off, all the rest soone followed seuerely, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward, insuiring such as were blacke. Only the Athedians and Ætolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult: and their feare was not great; the feat of the warre being fare from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who late still at Athens, deuiling vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their doors, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as firelesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Isocrates, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades a strong Periwader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of little regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leofthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to despay the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernment of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a competent proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratic. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their liuing out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and vying their voices, cried out, that this was a more Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publick right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had bene wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue surrendered their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemn him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action; how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswaded him to leaue the place; but not so preuailling, he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, howsoeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loued money well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he (as he thinks) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Country, great reward; for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which he did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleuee Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Country, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet so fauourable to the vanquished) he endeouored carefully to preferue.

*How Craterus and Antipater were drawne from their Etolian warres into Asia.
The grounds of the first Ciuill warre betwene the Macedonian Lords.*

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Etolians, whose pouerty was not so easily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Country was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnesse, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and loade the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Etolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and utterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miserable choice, either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger & cold, against which they could make no long resistance, or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue so stubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Etolians did not as yet want meat: but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater & Craterus thinke euery houre a month, till they had rid their hands of these Etolians, giuing them whatsoever conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to seuerer account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticke expedition, which did set the world in an vp-roare, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next vnto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue comforted with these two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernment of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Aridamus was a very simple man, yet yet serued well enough to weare the title of that Maiesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more seuerer than had beene in the dayes of Alexander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weakie Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferuing themselves from contempt, and of giuing such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadoeia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeits Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themselves vnable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, & set the Town on fire into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and siluer; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their seuerall Prouinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-royes (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and onely Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatnesse meet with a good title, and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolemy might giue, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolemy would follow of himselfe, or be driuen to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a boiste-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceiued in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a iudgement, as high a spirit, and as great vnderstanding as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the less respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men, with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a iecalous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to bee charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that sought his death. This deuice Antigonus would not seeme to perceiue, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer, in deede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Etolian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laied open, and must now be iustified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not onely for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slacke in prouiding to encounter him. Ptolemy being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerely they concerned him, sided with Antigonus. To his gouernment of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

they would all forth with reuolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to take him aide against Eumenes; and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Army to be sent. Their owne affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevaile much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Asians vastities, when others (imitating their King) bebooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garbages and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and discipline; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld the new robes of Asia, with discommodities, as reproachfull and derogatory to the honours of their native Country. Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold the Asians at bay, and to Idoneus with Phelomy. Craterus vied great celerity, to haue taken Eumenes recuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines; after a great victory. But he had a wary and well advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was no ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: yet the Army following him was much as much exceeded his own in footmen, but was inferior in horse-men; & thought more vncasie to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange peece of work, which desperation of all courtesie taught him, & wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Phrygia (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to ioyne with him. Hauiing animad his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among the Asians, (as hauiing bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, while they valiantly fought in his quarrell) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no messenger nor trumpet should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he bin known; but Thracians, Cappadocians, & Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdicus and himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run vpon the enemy, & glue him no leisure to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person; but placing himself in the right wing of his battell, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, & ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising peece of ground lay between them, which hauing ascended, the Armes discovered each other; but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of fruitlesse hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauiing failed in surpising them as enemies) to discover himselfe to his old friends & fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phanix a Tenidian, & Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindefull of their instructions, began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redem, he had his men fight & redem the day, & take the spoyle to themselves. But the Bear whose skin he feels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battell was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse; who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who as soon as they had discovered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down & fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose reuillings hee required, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spur, and seeke shelter behinde the battailes of their force. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie

succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed, but found wee occupied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Arrianus and Phemius, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and recede the night when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Other-wise he was not unlikely that he might haue either carried the day, or preserved himselfe to a better aduantage by sliding ground, as the rest (when hee and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But hee hee fought to preclude his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received, vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foote by many that knew him not, and so perished vnto such that it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauiing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a treatie of peace with Eumenes, making they of willingnes to betoome his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) hauiing done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battell fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily, and the Army being further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were which intended men against him, besides the death of Craterus, wherof it manifestly appeared that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Armie wanted pay: this was a great fault; which he wisely amended by giuing to them the spoyle of such Townes as were ill affected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdicus, hated him for his faithlesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithhood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late reuolt, than by accusing & condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherfore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrell between Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resignes his office into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Aridaus being chosen Protectors of King Aridaus and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weak to sustain so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridaus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, vvell vnderstanding what she was or should be; and thinking her selfe able to support the weight which Fortune layed vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander; by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntus, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdicus, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Ceria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had sought to do) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdicus, would not afterward bee reined with a twined thred. Python bearing himselfe vpon his office, tooke vpon him to giue directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controul, vnder the same name, with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python,

Pithon, seeing this, would needs resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the conceptions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into Spain, it is vncertaine.
 Perhaps hee thought, that now being the far warriourst man in the Campe, hee should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, for (as might be increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Emenes was nothing forrie at this counte, for now he thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Pithon, of their contrary expectations: choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Pithon. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, & began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord, save only the King their Spueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparant weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of ourlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian Campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand, arrived in few daies at the Campe, and answered Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Prouinces that remained alie, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonius General of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Emenes, he gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

Antigonius Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battell of Eumenes, and begetteth him in Nora: He vanquisseth other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatnesse of Antigonius, whose power in few yeares ouer-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keep his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might finde occasion to make vse of it in his own businesse. The first of these which hee vnderooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnreasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Armie strong in number, courage, and all needfull propositions, but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonius tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as he thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that hee and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonius) kept his treachery secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vnderaken, Antigonius presented battell to Eumenes; in the heat whereof Apollonides, General of the Horse to Eumenes, fled out to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traiterous practice had brought vpon him, pursued the villain, & cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonius, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonius himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonius held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaille had bene fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men,

men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes wch Menander (who was set to look vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victory, and loaden with the spoiles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should proue a heauie burden to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not haue restrained) by this sleight, letting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtlesse, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonius told them, that he had not forborne to doe this out of any good wil to them; but out of mere subtiltie had auoyded those precious fetters, which would haue hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only thinke all carriages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot.
 When hee had wearied Antigonius a while in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lyconia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, & so wel vi-sualed and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonius follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose hee entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For, whereas Antigonius offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouin-ces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonius leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iour-ney into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too aduenturous, in fighting at the first sight, vp-on all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with furable euent. Attalus with many principall Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termesus, where the loue of the yonger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their eares against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazzard their liues and their Country in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Governours of the Town hauing secretly compounded with Antigonius, caused the yong men to fall out; and vsing the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alcetus, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conueyed to Antigonius, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonius was gone, the yong men interred the carcase with solemne funerals, hauing once been minded to set on fire their owne town in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had he purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

S. XII.

Ptolomic winnes Syria and Phoenicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Only Ptolomic looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phoenicia:
 an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying vpon the authoritie which had giuen him that Prouince, & was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonum pursue the dispatch of those busineses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Atolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrel of Perdicus, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Sonne Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedonia and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was ialous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behaviour, not vnlearned, as hauing been Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. Hee had bene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstaine from coming into Macedonia, or meddling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gaue especiall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approved to haue been found and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polyperchon, who succeeded vnto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polyperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, hauing long time bene Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, he called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epyrus into Macedonia, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Maiestie, that might giue authority to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilst present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such oddes in the quality of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to imply. Hee should thereby haue bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons beset in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captaines, by-whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rescall multitude, couetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene

Eurydice,

Eurydice, who had in priuate fondred him such durlesse, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his sister possibilities, gaue him confidence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polyperchon much more renowned among the Macedonians, & strong enough to suppress him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion: The necessity was apparant of raising an Army, before the businesse was set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonum vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betwene his father and them, would auail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; & within a little while conueyed himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellespont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what hee desireth. Antigonum coueteth nothing more, than to find Polyperchon weak, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite coniuurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonum on the other side repaid him with the same coine, saying, That for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loued, he would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus sealed one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common meanes, leading to their fuercall ends.

§. XIII.

The unworthy courses held by Polyperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely prouision. For, Polyperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift; than the newes of his departure. Hee was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonum and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Græcian Estate. Therefore (louing to worke circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates & principal Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends; and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankfull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bounty had enabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their priuate Enemy, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodiles politike, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more intraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neere purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are invited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; she hath taught the arte to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are deprauid affections, affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetful of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ran vnder the Kings name; but so as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindness, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vsuit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subiects, and offered subdued Rebels.

6. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

Nethertheless the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, & fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Me-nillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way grateful to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grievously would they haue beene offended, had they known the instructions which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, & his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any iniunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should finde meanes to thrust some companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall haue, against the high-town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their councill, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phociens word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the war which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldom thrust by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Caprain following Polyperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to deuse vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the precept of Cassander, but prosecuting his own iust reuenge. He leuied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauens, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine flittles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before she durst well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and and meaning. He was (indeed) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he should rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in coniuring with Nicanor, but suffered not them for whom he laboured to labour, to meddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew iudicious, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured vnto vpon Phocion, deposing him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who to distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor; & held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driuen to seek safeguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Phocion was in the Country of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts, (hauing alwaies been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrey gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet either for want of judgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the biases, which made him commonly take of good lucke. For fear of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindness to the Athenians, this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue he gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, hee stood waivering betweene the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeed haue done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which was then growne to bee Master of that City. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phociens heels, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was gloried with all exteriour shewes of Maiestie; yet all too little to change Aridauro into Alexander; for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should bee tortured and slaine. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that hee cared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors hee then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guilty of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgessees. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to bee of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had hee beene chosen Governour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when hee was absent; so well was his integrity knowne, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, whose though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Calpebrene of hauing followed his example, nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedonia highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who by his other Offices of his forefathers, had two hundred talents of silver, & offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asiam, one which he would chooseth. But Philon refused these & other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pountry: wherein he liued about fourescore yeares; and then was compelled by the vnjust iudgement of wicked men to drink that poison, which by just iudgements of the Righteous God, he infected the City of Athens, as from that day forward as it neuer brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVII.
Of Polyperchon his vaine expedition against Cassander.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigon lent him, entred into Pitheus; which newes drew Polyperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only he had giuen some impediment to the enemy, who, not contented with defending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, hee left his Son Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further inroaching. The greatest part of his Armie hee carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Country sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratic, or Popular forme of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decreetooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedom and authority, with the blood of those who had kept them in subiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which hee reamed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand seruicable men, well furnished of necessities, & resolved to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that hee ouerthrow, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants hauing failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much paine to cleare the griddind, and to make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the Town-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nails, which they vsed as gal-throps, bestowing them feightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they let any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beate vpon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these prouisions they made happy vse in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherin the enemy chiefly trusted) either forely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polyperchon came at last furnish for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Ther-fore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee forsook the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Armie to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this hee sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyn with Aridemus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonum, came to the Propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonum hearing of the ouerthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victory, as well the might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee caused to be masked ouer the streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, and drew his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloody decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, hee could make the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that hee had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to giue them protection against the enemy, which lay in their bowes, came to a greene with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly rendered vnto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Country set in a combustion, vnease to be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonum an opportunitie, that hee neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

Antigonum seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord; and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him: Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonum.

A*ntigonum* had in Antipaters life time a firm resolution, to make vnto himselfe the most benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in fauour for aduancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; when then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small citie of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Port of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was manifestly subiect, would in continuance of some yeares (which hee might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and vnerserviceable: which made him to practise many deuises of keeping them in health and lustie. But when hee had continued thus vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good passe, and hee was eased of his cares by Antigonum himselfe, whose forces hee had besieged.

Antigonum knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his fidelitie shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designes, wherein hee doubted not that hee should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than euer hee had bene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as hee desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, hee might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the forme of the oath, did perceiue the meaning of Antigonum; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyal intent; the binding words & summe of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonum, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vnseemely to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soeuer hee gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off for the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming; but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonum, hee prepared to giue vp his hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when hee came to take it, hee made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough enough for itself and pages as the agency who would hold the two orders in return satisfying their obligation to the gods and humans which lay imposed on them by the gods, his words, and good blood to the people in the land, and the children of the land, and binding him to the gods and their children, and all the people of the land, and the parted on the land, and the children of the land, and the people of the land, and the Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of the Provinces, beheading himselfe according to the au-thoritie which he had received of ~~Lysimachus~~ ^{Antiochus} to that end, to purge him of the did he Avail himselfe in pretence wholely to his selfe (his proceedings, both in this purpose might lawfully hold the Protection) which the old man doing on his death bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, did him comfort of the Princess of Sardis, who might not be himselfe as well retaine the Lieutenants of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in pretence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme convenient, while he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death, to give a faire colour to his ambition; this was enough: if any were not hore with the fauour, he had three for the hand, the foot, the taylor and horse, and thirte Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridam Gouverneur of Phrygia, who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and sought to have Antioch of Zeus, a faire Hauen Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antiochus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrey. Aridam was so far from obeying him, that he sent forth to relieue Eumenes. Where the selfe finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he sought such companies as he could draw along with him, & so passed out into Europe to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Almus, who ruled in Lydia, & fought the like manner of his fortune with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, & grew desperate, when they were beate and so, as hath already been declared.

б. XVIII.

Antigonius pursues Eumenes. Eumenes, having authority from the Court, raises great War against Antigonius in defence of the Royal house.

Antigonus hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the leſſe; was able to haue entered Macedon; and ſeized vpon the Court; which that hee forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may ſeeme) for ſome of theſe reaſons: It would haue bred ſomuch ieaſouſie in Caffander, as ſeate in Polyſperchon, which might haue brought them to termes of reconciliation: It would aſke more time than he could ſpare; and the entrie which followed the Protectorſhip was ſuch, as he had power enough without the Office,ought rather to ſhun than to purſue. Beſides all this, it was manifeſt that Eumenes would not onely reſuſe to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Royall houſe; to which it was found that Antigonus did not ſtand well-affect. Againſt him therefore he bent his courſe, and with an Army of twenty thouſand foot, & foure thouſand horſe, made great haſte toward Cilicia, hoping to ſurpriſe him before he ſhould be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make war vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasur as much as he should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and be order'd by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, of filier-shielded bands, command where was giuen to be at his appointment. Hee had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and six hundred horse, before this authoritie was giuen him: But now hee purposed with all the strength which hee could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall bloud. Orsines had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and to her Nephew the Son of Antiochus; and as she had time to giue her his aduice in that which Eumenes was required of her: so she was

Alexander did not return into Media, but disappointed his ambition, and retired, confined within his own hands. Emmyus therefore continued her stay, and remained in Sparta, till night-time, as he could bring the return to a good issue, which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seeds of Alexander, to lift out of the world, and to be a Stranger is to confide, that in all the Empire, if there any one could be found among the Noble men, in whom Alexander brother, wars, and children, might repose firm confidence; having only this Emmyus, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Capit a Gile of Thracia. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to trauaile as to Media Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

How the Princes of Macedonia stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Asideus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOW, forasmuch as in this present Warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened; not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the royal house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the Warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great Iones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which ouerthrow most of them and out of their ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue bene depending.

Phylarchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the kingdome, and become Gouvernour to a King of his own making.

Empresse the Queene discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to fit in it, grew acquainted with Cassandra, who hated the memory of Alexander, and vvastherefore the fitter for her turne.

40 Alexander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had been through Alexander's malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloved this treife, either by supporting her weak husband, or by taking her to be his

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might reign in their feuerall Countries, & establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

50 Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

And Selenus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon his neighbours. Against these, Penestes, and some others, with much adoe hardly obtained peace, vntill such time as Emmenes came to them, who propounded to him the matter, which he listed not to accomplish.

Olympia the old Queene (as it is common with Rep-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poyson to Arrianus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to joyne with Polysperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, removing Arrianus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polysperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She her selfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, vntill she thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympia, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

The two Queens met armed, as if the matter should haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympia; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympia hauing obtained this victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed easily, and vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintaine her, who for her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Arrianus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost sixe yeares and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Arrianus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, & a cup of poyson, willing her to chooe the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympia, yeeled her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympia then chooe out, all whom he commanded to be slaine. His brother Isolus that was already dead & buried, she accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be thrown downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

How Cassander was reuenged vpon Olympia.

†. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympia shuts her selfe into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Acides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympia, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus, vvhither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he neuer staied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his journey toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire, of iust reuenge. The Asians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in fauour of the Queene and Polysperchon, so hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, vvhith which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he diuided his companies; appointing Bothe under Callias, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perbabis; with the rest he marched directly against Olympia. She, hauing once prevailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Majestically, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, & her young son Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designation: who, during his minority kept the soveraigne power in her own hands. But all this pompe serued to little else, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himself before the wals, onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoake.

Acides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympia, his couzen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassander's men, they called vpon him to retire, & quit the enterprife. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceede, and the obstinate refusal of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to haue prevailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and down in forraine Countreies a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp streightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe by conuey into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were managged abroad.

†. II.

Accomplishment of Olympia's her storie. Polysperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympia yeeldes to Cassander.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes & Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympia yet a while to the houre of her destiny; which growes the faster vpon her, because she may discerne it coming; yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polysperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bin, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirus. For Callias, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with money, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre prevailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellows, and saw-dust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had referred themselves to the euent, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were cūen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympia bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, out of which she should not be deliuered, but vnto an end death. Being therefore vterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her & the other Ladies, vncustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered compensation & with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander who having secke her Gally out of the Haug, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body, a grant of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the kingdom, was yielded to Cassander. Amphilochus did stand out for Ariston (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the successe of some petty seruices wherein he had preuailed) began to prouaile himselfe great vnlikehoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, vvhich partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innovation.

§. III.
The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

When Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, she herself was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation, who to hasten the execution sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, & other necessities, to saue her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, & tel her own tale, he dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister vnto two kings of Epirus, vvhich, & mother, vnto two of the mightiest kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of vnreprouceable chastitie; but her ambition vvas boundlesse, her hatred vnappeasable, and her furie in reuenge, most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other vviues and Concubines, vvhich caused her to hate both him, and them. She vvas thought priueto her husbands death; after vvhich, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other aine in fire, in a copper balon. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her vvell) forbod her to meddle in the gouernment of Macedon. But God more seuerely vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their vviils, permitted her to liue and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse, (vvhich vvas his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all vvhich, he rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

§. IIII.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pella, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his viues; that by her he might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young son to a close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase loue, built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeares waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, wherunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily preuailling in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.
Of the great Lordship which Antigonus got in Asia.

§. I.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia; His wife dealing with those that ioynd with him.

E*menes*, having ioynd vnto his company the Argyraspidæ, made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countreies, according to his commissions, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his journey through Calasyria and Phenicia, hoping to reclaim those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath bene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectually. The Captaines of the Argyraspidæ were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take the obedience, and their fidelity was so vnsteady, that he might more easily haue dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by punishment. Therefore he faired, that Alexander had appointed vnto him a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich paultion, wherein an emptie throne vvas placed, as if Alexander himselfe had bene present at their consultations. Thus he had himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they departed (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he matched on, sending before him the Kings vvarrant, vvhich Ptolemy and Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as being condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes knowing well that he was not to rely vpon their assistance, vvhich stood otherwise affected than his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt vwith by persuasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrey of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, vvas glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Penceles and the rest of the Easterne Lords, vvhich were glad of his coming, because of the differences betweene Ptolemy, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them, euery one finding matter enough to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one paultion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that vvhich Eumenes propounded, vvhich vvas both vvisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by means of the authoritie giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driuen off with lesse.

A*ntigonus*, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To vvhich end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he marched out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered, and taking to him Ptolemy and his men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue Battell. Eumenes had fortified the Caste of Susa, & was retired back toward Persia keeping keeping the River of Tyrrus between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espial kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he took. Before he came to Tyrrus it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tyrrus, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yielded themselves prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, to that was notable to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the hate of that Countrey in the dog dayes, breeding diseases in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pyrrhus with him, (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the neerer way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, vvith his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

S. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battaile betwene him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Faine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him, to which all the Capitaines of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Pencestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countreys, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needs march Eastvvard. These carried it, for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Pencestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing wherunto those doings tended, fustied him a while to keep good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouvernor of Armenia, to Pencestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias, had vanquished Cassander, & sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioine with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by vvhom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in vvry bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Capitaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a far off, could not refrain from giuing him deferred commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Capitaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes; which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile vvvas fought vvith variable success, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his incamping on the ground wheron they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; vvvhich was accounted the signe of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies craving it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrey round about; whereas Antigonus vvvas glad (having carried but one day) to steal away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

Of diuers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Thus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals; but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wilderness, hardly passable. Another way, fairer, and leading through a Countrey well peopled, but requiring 35 daies iourney, he forooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come vndiscovered. So therfore taking his iourney in the dead of winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them descried a farre off. This commandement had been well obserued foure or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly breeding negligence, & the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neere to their waics) ended. The light of these fires gaue notice of their coming, which being reported to Pencestes, and other Capitaines, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearken his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurably, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there hee chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had been present. This was a forrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tyred with a long and painful iourney. Therefore he resolved to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some inhabitants of that desert to bee taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had been so deluded. Therefore hee went against these troupes with great fury, meaning to take their vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much business, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Endamus, Capitaine of the Elephants, whose beasts those beasts had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Endamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, & so to defend himself as well as he could; for his horsemen, ouerlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to run away vpon the spur. Neither knew they, vvho fate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued vounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came v unexpected to the rescue, and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes, who though he knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

S. V.

S. V.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Capitaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with enuie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great iniustice to impute the mischiese contriued against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deservings: For though it often happen, that small vices do serue to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdom, to finde good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtiesie, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and careful by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his metier vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vsed to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he reuolued many things in his minde, being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flee into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betweene Antigonus and Eumenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuouly bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of beeing beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to ioyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice vnto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siluer-shields were men of threescore or seventy yeeres old, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very peniue, and hauiely, suspecting their owne cause; and fearing that the threatning vnto them would prove true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine levelled field. Taking therefore himselfe and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Philip, he did set forward courageously against the Enemies, that were ready to meet him in that uncertaintie.

Eumenes took vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sudden; and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pythion, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient; commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, exposing the euent of the other side.

So they ioynd very fiercely, Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to dye an honourable death, or to win such a victory vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunity to deal with his false friends.

The followers of Antigonus, being euen in their owne opinions, far inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Siluer-shields, who slew aboue fise thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battell, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though he failed of his purpose, yet with great slaughter he did do beat vpon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindred the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not only haue defended them, but peraduenture haue surprised those which came to surpise them, and so haue done as good a piece of seruice as a better man. But he vvas gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde that he could not possibly giue an eye to euery place, being not well able to continue where he vvas.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand, whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, beganne to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe, as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that vvas not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to ioyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, vvhether he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; & therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him; the other halfe he committed to Python, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retreat, which yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended, wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoyle which he got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

S. V II.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slaine.

Eumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanour that day had so cruell'd the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilderness, ouer the high mountains.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captaines would needes returne into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to die or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Tenatimus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traitorous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as hee thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices, in the warre of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtille man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreatie, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliué. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeeme by another fight; in the midst of this goodly talke, they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, & bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their eares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliué (that was their own Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to send a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not suddenly resolute, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saued, he would soone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reuerse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haste of other businesse made him do it by the sword.

To this end came all the traualles of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelity, & patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his government of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered, by Caspar de Colignie, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the mas-acre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gave to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliué; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries; vnder pretence of vvarres; but with a priuie charge, to consume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliué into his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beate vpon the shoies of Greece and Macedonia.

S. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

THE two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter, the common Souldier idly; the principall men industriously bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Python began to consider his owne desertings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, he was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were vnsecret; and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouraged by Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissension betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finely chide Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the loue of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, even an offensive warre. But what need had he to vse the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way; but swamme carelessly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions; thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from vvhom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Governours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his own creatures, exception such as lay too farre off to be dislodged easily.

Peucestes, vvhom ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceived, hauing to doe with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer after tooke effect. Thus he, that enuid the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely and forgotten.

S. IX.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peace, and all the treasures therein beflowed. This offer was to great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vied him with excessive kindnesse, for feare so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which added to his former store of money, made vp 25. thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with Intent to leaue no Countrey behinde his backe; that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, becomming the Maistie of a king. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable, saying, That it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull, who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should finde such issue, as Pytho and Peucestes had done. Therefore, taking with him onely fifty horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countreys were yielded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he so wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should haue hinged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did after him, whom the destinies preferred for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he tooke his iourne into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took vp ten thousand talents more of the kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found 40 his yearly in-come to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.*

S. I.

The combination of Ptolomie, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands and his answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, equied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good good government gotten vnto Syria, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to repaine him in their loue toward him, that would be ready to require them with the like. And he cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the host forward of them; which was Ptolomie, it being likely that a good army should preuaile more than a faire shew. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he took the way toward Syria, & was encountered by Embassage from them all. They told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victory, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed; they held it very iust, that all should be partakers in the fruites of that Voyage, wherein they had been all adducturers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, a thing easie to be done, he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to eueryones liking, if he would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; & Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellepont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those western Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Prouided alwaies, that he might be their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had bene driven vniniuriously; that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly content vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, he should yet be able to redeeme peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worse, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his means kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon; and the coucell of estate in Macedon. But what maruell was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meere bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those daies command me to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pity him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well, but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

The preparation and beginnings of the warres.

¶ Then the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but Warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soone as hee was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coasts, & hinder Cassander from landing in Asia; giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent out to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece & Cyprus; not vnprovided of money; to draw friends to his side, & raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially he laboured to make himselfe the strongest

strongest by Sea, to which purpose he rather hated, than forebowed his iourney into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Naue. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord; his other Prouinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a yeare and three months, not idly. For he took Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and well vied. The strong city of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes, which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoued him to do. His forces were notable to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnrady) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp Steele.

The same commodity of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the son of Antipater, howsoever by the painfull and learned writer Reimerus Reineccius, he is by some ouersight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

S. III.

How each party fought to winne the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander, Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon recuelted from Antigonus which set him vp.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide, which way soeuer it inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom hee waged eight thousand, & caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himselfe again, and taking vpon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks & Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympius, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Lady Roxane, Alexander's wife, and his sonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Theoalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by

by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Lady Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Demetrius, General of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed traitors, and open enemies to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome; this hee did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greeks would adhere vnto him, as to their Ioung Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall blood. But concerning his loyalty to the yong Prince, the world was too wise to be decieued with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greeks was more effectual, and got easie belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomy strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded him farre more troubleable in war, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to take all sure, decieued himselfe, nor without great cost. For hee gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon five hundred talents, wishing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassander's men had with much blood shed, glenously afflicted the contrary faction; and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoyled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able, not onely to win the donour, but to outbid such as might seeme best assured; he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender on faire conditions, that which he could not haue himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Antigonus, about the matters in controversy.

10 In telling him, that Antigonus was very skillfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who prebaited, but onely desiring to haue them weary themselves, whilst he was busied else where; that so at length he might find opportunity to set vpon the stronger; therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his hand the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, & enter into a faire & faithfull league with Ptolomy, Cassander, & the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himselfe, that the Country which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him; that was onely the Factor of a proud inuious man, to flatter himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent, which he did not carry very secret of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was tooone emulated to accept of good an offer, and did not like to enter into that league, whereby he was to become the Lord, and subject vnto no mans control.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, as he lost both it and his life together, by reason of the Sicyonians, who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were afterwards vanquished in battaile by Cassander, Alexander's wife, a discreet and valiant Lady, who in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight, and hauing by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and gouerned those places that she liued, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbour.

10 In the mean time, Cassander was not idle, but did with all speed, to put his Army in good order, and to make himselfe ready to receive the challenge, which he thought he should receive from Antigonus. And thus ended the first part of the fourth Booke.

§. IV.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-army of Antigonus, victoriously defeated by Ptolemy's Lieutenant. In what terms the warre stood at this time. Antigonus drawes nearer to Greece.

A Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Ætolians against them: Likewise he laboured to winne to his party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deale with Ptolemy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies enuying the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wan some of their owne Country; fortified the Acarnanians against them, & compelled Glaucius, King of the Illyrians, whom hee vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassander's friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army vnder conduct of Perillus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolemy's Naue. Polyperus, who in Ptolemy's behalfe had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, & by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom hee very cunningly pursued. Hee rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Perillus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, & many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellows that were on Land, but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentiue onely to that business, Polyperus appeared at their backs; who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behinde, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolemy about some composition. First, he sent Ambassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolemy: so the parley was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victory with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolemy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the rout of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Ætolians & him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus, his advantage were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerser to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, mony, and ships, no otherwise than as the paying of his taxes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a lump of Ptolemy's his enemy; and lengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were but too sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he was wont to proceed as occasion should offer, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse, wherewith though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people being tied vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did grow proper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria vnder his son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captaines or assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

§. V.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

The coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his business these abouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side: Senthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the querrell: All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to help them with mony and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Acacides lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto all Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee suddenly presented himselfe before one of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne vnto their former duty. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, hee overcame Senthes; and following the trace of his victory, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Army; and all his men hee did either put to ranfome, or fill vp with them his owne Bander: The like successe had Philip, Cassander's Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For hee wasted their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them: and after the victory, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Acacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Ætolians out of most of their Country; and forced them to seek their safety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required sometime, and wearied Antigonus his adversaries with painful traualle; after which they remained only fauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leigse wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece; bestowing liberty vpon all the Cities hee tooke out of Cassander's hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection; ready to doe or suffer anything for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will, but they were kept in by Cassander's Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedonia: by which terrour hee forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forraigne succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassander's departure, entred the Country; drave his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thbes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thbes had not long before bin raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander, of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the loue of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullity, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Prolomy and Seleucus met, against Demetrius the son of Antigonus.

AS the prefence or neer nesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia and Greece, so the desires of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, where with in the yeare preceeding he had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes waured betweene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet hee ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria & Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subiects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed Foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the sea, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. And wretched to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return vpon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt; and there Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he leuied with all conuenient speed, for the recouery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies coming with a puissant Army, to giue him battle. Hereupon he called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Comanders. Neither found he much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome iourney ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Army felt not any great grieuance of the euil way, when battaile was presented them; which confidently they undertooke. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vitterly vnprovided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chains, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, (which besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeare, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation; they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight began, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion; as trading little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better our, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessity would needes fight a battaile with disaduantage, began to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight hee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horse-men of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, & prevailed little, till now perceiving that all was layd vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to prouide for their safety by timely flight, vvch example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilst they were full of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and droyd vp the gates thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already laden. Ptolomies Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This victory restored vnto Ptolomy the best part of Syria; a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keep, and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betwixt Gaza and Phoenicia no place offered resistance. In Cölosyria & Phoenicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrys and Sidon, of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants: Tyrys by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captaine, vvho trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Seleucus reconered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed this businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to try his owne fortune; which he found so fauourable, that recouering first his owne Prouince, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to haue been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which hee came it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus, his owne men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a resistent of warre, vvch by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a desolation so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigoniens, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for euery man of them should haue been troubled vvith daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held, for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparant. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like; for his owne great Army lay betwene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now gotten what he fought; it behoued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull help, came, with ten thousand Foot, and seauen thousand Horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred Horse, and somewhat about three thousand Foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large Conquest of vntwarlike Nations hauing yielded him many loyng Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were nere to the River of Tygris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marshes nor fare off; where he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his Campe. In recompence of this vaine security, his Campe was taken by surprize, the first night of his arriuall; the Satraps, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Capitaines, were slaine; hee himselfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Defarts, and the whole Army yielded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeare of this Era. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the six hundred and nineteenth yeare of Nabonassar, was the fourescore and two yeare of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeares was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight yeares after Nabonassar. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recopied by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting, finding the same Planets to haue been so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obserued it, in the same year, which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth, from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeare; and the last of the hundred thirty and seuenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the yeares of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vtremembred fractions) if they seem to bee here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeares of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Books of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a few yeares distance.

How Ptolomy lost all hee wonne in Syria. what she causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had bene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill successe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomy all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces therabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeme his honour lost. Antigonus vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy won vpon a bearded Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did not himselfe follow his owne businesse in Cœlbyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much vnderualue the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately saved his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of hauing a faire way at his backe, than aduenturous in setting further forward, than vnto real on should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all leaue; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would sticke out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his iourney with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall fauour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy, and therefore he fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprize, wherein he might perceiue, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driuen to make a shamefull retreat, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate: in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus in the meane, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whether hee made a halde, nor so much to relieue his sonnes, as to embrace him. For hee reioyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, laid by his son; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance. Ptolomy had no lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming hee had to the Campe of Antigonus. For he made it a matter of consultation, as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt, alleging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive warre. So he departed out of Syria, preferring his honour, as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of fear: and he departed at faire leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonius, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, & many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had ouer-run, with so hasty a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineue; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and againe recovered by contentions Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if we shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwayes bene subiect vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all foueraigne power, or high authority, the life and spirit of euery Estate, they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satrapes, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strue to lay hold vpon those Provinces, which had many ages bin subiect vnto them, & scarce foure years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde his lesse reason to suspect the History, than authority to confute it. For we seldome read, that any small Kingdome, preuailling against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compass of ten years; as leste vnto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor meane to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavel; and concerns all other Kingdomes, that are subiect vnto the like forme of Government: the summe whereof is this, Wherefoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of Slaues, there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader, should preuaile so farre vpon Turkey, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he vses not to suffer aliue) were taken on foot; the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassas, how great soeuer they may seeme, are meer Slaves; and there is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose person all might could get the people to follow him in such an enterprise, whose tops of priuie counsell should not counteruaile all apparant matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the stronger in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall blood, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mighty in their severall Countries, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raise Warre in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will alwayes stirre vp and inflame them: so that vntill euery one piece were won, and euery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobility, brought vnder or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor wel assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they soone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to feare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischief that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: vvhich done, the Traitor hath spent his time, and must either flye to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices, and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aduersity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turke Bassas, or Principall Gouernours, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse & utter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the Subject, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other deuce painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slavery.

As in the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and vnto the destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that ioyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Mages: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Mistres, which hath been formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapes, or Gouernours of the Provinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, prouing them to haue bene meer slaues: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the generall want of liberty conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse auailable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavel. For as Aespe his Assie did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heauier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that were the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearful of a forraigne yoke;

Nor

Nor will be hasty to make it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes bear such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French; this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous opptessours; and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been subiect vnto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tameness, which we finde in those that had been subiects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparant. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them vnder, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell vpon the Nabathæans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mait; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrr, Frankincense, & other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their coming was sudden & vnexpected. But ere they could re- couer Syria, the Nabathæans ouertook them, & finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of foure thousand foote, an sixe hundred horse, onely fifty horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of a vaste Wildernes, lacke of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they crauid it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabathæans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Ptolomy: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great & wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, wher by Syria and the lower Asia should haue been exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius with fiftene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his son did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his son a peremptory commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnsettled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vaine to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessities should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leauing behinde him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more than nothing, forsooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

6. I X.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

These ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themselves with vneffectual traualle, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no priuate hatred, but mere desire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulnesse growing vpon the slow aduancement of their feuerall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serue to fight againe.

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the businesse; That the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the States of Greece should be set at liberty. The aduancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kingdom, seemes to haue bin a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in fort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betwene them, rooted in these grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that so held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Antigonus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto bene the subiect of much idle discourse; but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarce any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if he should set free, he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greece seas, together with a great Armie, and mony enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold vpon the tread of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as euer they had bene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equall to them all in puissance. Cassander's friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe without: for where euery one mans helpe is necessary to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subiect vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the child and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yeelding vp his gouernment, which he must haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, vvhich was perhaps the cause why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, she had vsed the fauour of Perdiccas to the satisfying of her owne bloudy malice, vpon Stratonice the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For, hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, he did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew, as inwardly was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus; that had worke enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each to man to improve his owne stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont; while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece; yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomy, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at liberty. Vnder colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he wan foure Townes, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: & in that voyage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requittall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had been to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at liberty, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired work, that Cratesipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchon's son, gaue vp into his hands the Towns of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceived a vaine belief that the Greekes, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby vnto little labour, their liberty might be gotten; & he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long seruitude had wel neere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit therof; but sat idlely siting, willing it to fall into their mouths.

The Laedemonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Towne with wals, trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, & the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Towne and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the year. This Demetrius was now their Gouverneur; & he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of money and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the worke in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomy into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his owne advantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, hee freed himselfe from a greater danger, than those those murders which he had committed seemed lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the reigne of Alexander, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage, leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barbus the Daughter of Antiochus a Persian, but had beene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time to the death of his brother had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders onely liuing child, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that ioyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not beene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his entrie into Macedon; but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himself, with gifts and promises, wherewith at length he preuailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill; choosng rather with many curses, and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while beene asleepe, though his losses were hitherto the chiefe winckles, of his hauing bene a stirrer in these commocions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomy had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerful, or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomy sweat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and haue thought to the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long trise, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne should haue depended. Against this enuie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: vvhom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever she discouered much vnwillingnesse thereunto, yet was therein his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsive meanes: either because his fancie, being on old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, wherunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparant wrong. She had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia, hoping belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those brave Captaines, that were, in times following, to hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe vwith providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie vvidow, suffered her blood, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a iest: saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired onely a proper man, with whom the might leade a merry life. To this purpose did she inuite Leontus vnto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long carrying, he had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus; who had wived already, Ptolomy had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suite: peradventure it advanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of iournall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her iourney from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares; he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. She would not be his wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bin the way, by which to he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady lesse respected than Alexanders own sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouverneur of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we need not aske: for seldome is that bloody crime vnto reuealed, and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soone after cast down, ouer-whelming themselves or their children, vith the ruines, as the sequelle will declare.

6. X.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gave libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrison of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

None being left alieue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill becomed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was careful how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparant, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of royalty, vvhether in seeming modestie, he was not couetous. To this purpose, he deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fise thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entered the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomy, Cassanders good friend, had bin arriued. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and vvhay was the cause of his coming; the ioy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalerens forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, vvhich after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the obseruance of generally commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratepholis lay in Patra, and had a great desire to see Demetrius. Having heard that the mighty Prince, by his means, better her estate, and recover her Townes of Sydon and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy, to vvhose Lieutenant, in those places Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the onely business that he pretended was loue. He being aduertised, left his foile in the Countrey of Megara, and taking a company of his light-armed, for guard of his person, made a long iourney to meete with her. This troupe alie, he caused to lodge in great way from his Tent, that none might see her vvhether she came so closely as the business was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it, wherby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of safety by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their proiect fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to mystifie himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leaving them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions; especially an extreame dissolute, and in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of warre. He was of a most excellent countenance, a gentle nature; and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reuerse his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more bold, and prosperity puffd him with ouerweening; wherein he thought, that he might do what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, the picture of her wheele, vith the had wound vnto the third of his life, in such manner as might be feared.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his business at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of his siege, to assaile Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens, which vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that beured the wals, prevailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within, and wan the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were buelled with the ground, & so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their liberty, with promise to continue in maintaining it.

The time of this action was blowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill & industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuening to base flattery, the eloquence of theis, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the s-ligher; they called them by the Names of the gods their Seniors, ordaining that euery yeare their should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of the two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods, as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruitfull diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsomely take vp to him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse he would seeme to approve his vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with his fine handling him, that when the Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, & Timber to build ships, he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheate, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So suspicious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolemy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the title of King; wherein others followed their example.

FROM this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius vnto a businesse of greater difficulty; meaning to employ his seruice against Ptolemy, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should reade of matters concerning the common good of the Countrey. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Iulias, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeces, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to holde his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that he should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pitifull Tragedy, had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indifferetion of Menelaus, Ptolemies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicoteles, king of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus; yet not so farre, that he thought himselfe excused; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off his negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoteles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolemies name, to haue him yielded to the death. Nicoteles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity, caused the vnhappy King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew her selfe, but perfwaded the wiues of her husband to do the like. Also those Brethren of Nicoteles, vnto whom Ptolemy had intended no ill, being amazed with the sodainnesse of this calamity, did shut vpon the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and then felues together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was, Nicoteles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this accident, though Menelaus deferred the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolemy: as men that are grieued, cast an infection, euen vpon those, that gave the farthest remoued occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolemy was like to make. The Cyprians did little or nothing against him: either because they had final strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves lose the rule of their owne Countrey. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within the wals of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Island. His greatest helpe at the present was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good vllage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolemy had not halted to the rescue.

Ptolemy brought with him, a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible show, when it was descried a farre; though more than halfe of it was vsfit for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolemy sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, vnto lesse he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young Gallant repaid him with words of as much brauery, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sydon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eigheteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Egypt; better stored with weapons fit for that seruice, and very well furnished with Engines in the prow, as bene vpon abhominable Noes. Helellie he stood in great doubt of threescore Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, left Menelaus with them should set vpon his backe in which case, it was very likely that all should go very ill with him. Against this mischiefe, he belloved vnto his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of his Fleet departed to Sea against Ptolemy.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with downfall successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other, but held each of them the left side of his own fleet. Each of them preuailed against the squadron where with he was opposed; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedy flight. As for Ptolemy, hee was faine to leave his advantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might be able to animate those of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his losse ouer-great to be repaired, by coming any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to keepe himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell no vnusall accident; yet was the victorie greater than could haue been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-fighting, which the Greeces and Phinicians, that were with Demetrius, had; and those which followed Ptolemy: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no less than in the quality of those with whom they were managd. Further, we may readly iudge, that the two hundred ships of both, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they left off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so do; yet a multitude, prepossest with vaine conceits, wil commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was utterly frustrated. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar vp the mouth of the Haven; which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in Fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde some part of their fears vaine, do easily gather hopeful spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolemy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strue against the violence of fortune, but yielded vpon all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelve thousand foote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same deiection of spirit was found in the common Souldiours, as well as was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land; none of them respoing any more confidence in Ptolemy, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally beleued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the life of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was greatly especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the pleasure of his ioyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward looking very sadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriuall (for it was not known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meete him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much as a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could bee won from this demure desire Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward with a great throng of humble men, and struck with to set out his Pageant, when he came in sight of Antigonus, which could yet containe himselfe, but went downe to meete him at the Gate, and there the women, when did Antigonus, vpon the scaffold, with a high voyce saluted him, and by the name of King, uttering the greatest of the victorie, with as much pomp, as before he had done, in the hearing of all the people, who with loude acclamations gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus and his sonne Demetrius.

Then, in the midst of the long suspense, wherein Antigonus had helde him, layd, That in which all his long life he receiued his reward. But the Title of King, to be given with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not repose himselfe to ascribe, wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne, and so did, and so did.

When he was once noyed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings, it was not long ere their followers were ready to follow the good example. Phar- mach his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man deficient for the loss of a flect; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus had had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his own head. Seleucus had, at this time, among the barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now he vied the stile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his own name; whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house.
But the name which he forbore, his sonnes after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill success, as will appear, when they shall enter vpon the Stage, wherein the Persians, Medians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and illumination, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: vntill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

S. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with all successe.

AL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as becomming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others; who should hardly be able to stand, vwhen the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Armie of eightene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: likewise a flect of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Navy Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was ready for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile, imputing it to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that vvas soone changed into Sidon, by his mortal enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met vwith his flect. The next day that he drew vnto Egypt, the more haste, he made: thinking by celeritie to preiudice more than by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes provision of Vittuals, and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desert.

over which he marched with no small toyle, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cosinus, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he saw his flect riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore, in ill case, and many shippes wanting. It had bene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driven backe to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks, as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe. After these painfull trauailes, there followed a warre no lesse painfull than to little purpose: for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the River of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guardes should happen to be foret, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertain the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus fought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assau-led the Rampiers raised vpon the River in vaine, Ptolomie assailed the faith of his souldiers, with good successe; for with great gifts & greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdic- cas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his armie farther off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bin won from him.
To prevent therefore as wel the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forc't retrait, he secretly practised the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leauing Egypt.

It indeede lesse preiudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be solid on Counsellors & Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vassall.
Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laid the losse and dishonour he recei-ued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antoine de Lens, whether iustly or no, know not; but howsoeuer, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doub-full enterprises is rather a testimony of loue, than of wisdom, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime known it, that great Commanders, vvho are for the present in place of Kings, haue not onely bene dissuaded, but held, in a kind of strong hand, from hazarding their own persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer been called to a Marshals Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioy in Egypt. Ptolomie held a folemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus Lysimachus, and Cassander his Confederates, strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensive Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himself vwith another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witness of his owne great-nesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare fauers by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retraite. Howsoeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his assayres home forth in another fashion; for that which he could not cleaue a sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, vvhom

the forermentioned Confederates should be forced either to relieue, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provisions, promised him victory.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it self in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deale of riches to it selfe; to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet: of well armed shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and petty Theues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections, carried them to the Egyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, and neighbourhood was fearefull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrell to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by petty iniuries, of taking some of their shippes, with such other grieuances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Island, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance & seruice, against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, & not by loue; raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many shippes of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to bee imposed vpon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, & made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bondmen, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-flaues with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, he did neuer shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole yeare, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine vvhich they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolome had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surpris, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which he himselfe ledde as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed & endangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse success) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vnder takings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Etolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander; but for Ptolome, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammou, gaue the same fair answer for Ptolome, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heeles, so was William at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius preuailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonus.

Demetrius comming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much auail him, which was so great, that five thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giuing liberty vnto the people, he bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went he into Thracianus, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for he suddenly tooke Byzantium, Carrinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrius. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure. At the Isthman games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Capitaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had bene in former times: wherevpon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behaviour he was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deferred none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians already as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and iust with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the war should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his Enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Emballadors, but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolome and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flocke of birds are driuen away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himselfe, & no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies, who at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while he himselfe with the rest should besiege Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, began to make his warre vpon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him by faire meanes: winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hasty iourneys, and came some enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to draue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauens, of which he now stood in great need, & therefore was faine to speak them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shal liue to teach them their old language, & speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he failed to the Thracians, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or meanes wherewith to sustaine him & his follo were any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to bury himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lyfimachus his Kingdome, whereof hee gaue all the spoyle that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaid againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords; wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise diuided from his owne Territory, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that hee could of the victory, at which, neuertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read in the Law vniuersall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slaine Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the son out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lyfimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though he were his wife) vnto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betwene Seleucus and Demetrius; betwene Ptolomy and Lyfimachus; betwene Demetrius and Cassander; betwene Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betwene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betwene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, & other Princes, neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, than those of the same later times haue beene, as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of France the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may obserue: betwene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninety and five, when Charles the eighth undertooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeare One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died; the Histories of those times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the Bedde on by the Book, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Phylarchus, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for the latter was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that enuied vnder it a lawfull Heire; neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacy hee should haue done against the common enemy. So Phylarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander; and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperity, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time hee tooke to Wife a daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wiues being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was hee by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends, for neither of them witheld him any good, otherwise than might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them haue been contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther off, than send his estate vnder their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Ile of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue set his new father-in-law vpon the necke of Lyfimachus; or whether he were indeede greedy of the baggage, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia: Hereto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as he could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusal so displeased Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered vnto him; which were the busie places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. Instead of giuing them vp, Demetrius took present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his Father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends out of enuie to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

In the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the liberty, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyranny of Laches. Through which alteration their distempred City was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage halld him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging fury. He brought against them all the force that hee could well spare from other employments; which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any business that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprize in Athens had ill success, a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where he wan diuers Townes that had fallen from him) turning to the enterprize, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it any long time: for it stood vnder barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals, being all so destitute of meane to keepe such a Name, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the Ile of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fifty ships with corne, and sent them to relieue the hungry City: But the hundred and fifty were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hastened away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come to see that they might be desiered. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreame, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Moule, which dropped downe between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yceeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propole any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not only forbear to take away the liues of these vnthankfull men, which they had submitted vnto his mercy, but out of his liberality gaue them food, & placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuerthelſſe he was growne wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and dispose of them at his pleasure, hee was ready to lay hold vpon the word, & leaue a sure Garrison within their walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedæmonians in two battailes, and was in very faile possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes called him in all haste, of Lyſimachus and Ptolomy; that preuailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyſimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. While he was bethinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater & Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed beneaffected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause; drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queens death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lyſimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shuffed well for himselfe, at such time as euer man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, & a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympia he had an hereditary quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom she could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty, that she vsed against his friends, both alie and dead; as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care bow farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carelesnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindered his purpose, argues him to haue been rather skillfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a her of the dangers, that may quietly passe away; and seeks to auoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympia and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill befel them if Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his Bed, yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

Of Pyrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassander his children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon, preuailes in warre against the Greekes; Leifts reputation in his warre against Pyrhus; and in his ciuill Government; and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrhus and Lyſimachus invade him, his Army yields to Pyrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lyſimachus.

Pyrhus, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Antiochus, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preferred, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias King of Illyria, the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire Glaucias was so faine from betraying Pyrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeares of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeares, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him awhile in his warres, was with him in the great battell of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Colophesus, & was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he behaued himselfe; that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, so that he married her Daughter, & was vpon sent home, with money & men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out this businesse between the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the eldest of Cassanders sons, was so farre too weak for Pyrhus; that hee had no desire to attend the committing of Demetrius; but made a hasty agreement, and quitted the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander, who likewise took the aide of Pyrhus (so troublesome) that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrhus had the audacity to demand, or rather as granted, by strong hand, Ambacia, Acarania, and much more of the Countrey, as the reward of his pains, being the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition vould not satisfy Demetrius, who took this matter haughtily, that he was sent for, and made a fool, to come so farre with an Army, and finde no worke for it. This was a fruitlesse complaint, whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrhus had done; and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Here vpon it seemed to Alexander a vaine course, to reboue this most diligent friend, by murthering him vpon some aduantage. This Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true, though the greatest part, and perhaps the whole, beleeued it not. But hee knew, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and lured by Demetrius, who took his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; and hee saw, how hee was selling his owne danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had bene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. He felt out happily, that about the same time Lyſimachus was blisied in warre with King of the wilde Thracians; forthwith he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine he caused the remainder of Macedon to be giuen vpon this is, the man belonging to Antipater his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievedly lamented, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still hee sturmed, vntill his Father-in-law to lue the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. Thus Demetrius, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to liquid molestation, vvere slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wise sort of policy, with carefull meditation, so much the more wicked as the more long hee vould haue to erect his owne house; that fell downe vpon his grieuance to the earth on it being brought to the ground.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity, and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Government: but thought he followed by his actions this be thought) the vice and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, other, than to doe what a King listeth. He gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, & the tedious discourse of doing iustice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: war being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as sixe years reigne is long to him, that knowes not how to reigne one yeare) he discovered to much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making war in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but vsed his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus hee would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betwene them notwithstanding) at such time as hee was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journey purchaseth nothing but enmity. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrhus, with no better, or rather with worse cunct. Pyrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome, he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any hand some pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, hee mist that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which hee ouerthrew, not vvith more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combat against Pantanchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant, vvho being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours vvere not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King, whom they began to disesteeme, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good cases) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparrell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnnmanly; and seruing chiefly to be a daily wittnesse, how much hee contemned them and their good opinions. Of this Souldiers lues hee was retchlesse: & suffered vniuersally this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his throat. That the more of them died, the fewer hee was to pay. He made a mockery of iustice; and as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little hee esteemed in death; hauing by a shew of popularity inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their supplications, he led the poore sufferers after him in great hope, till hee had come to a bridge, he threw all their writings into a Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee would so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these countes hee grew so bold, that Pyrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost wonne it all vvith little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrhus glad to forsake his winning way, and be gone.

At length he began to haue some feeling of the generall haue; vvich to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their vvild discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia, with a vvhole Army: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace vvith Pyrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did hee compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horses with a Nauie of five hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bin seen before; yet so swift and vsfull vvithall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious son of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than cuer was his father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, & each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Camp, that Pyrhus had won Berrhaa. The matter was not ouer great: were it not, that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the campe was in vvproare: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to go to their owne houses, meaning indeed to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceiued the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne counterman, against Pyrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisdome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as hee, to meet with Pyrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others asseyred, of his person, his armour, and other tokens vvherby, hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ran ouer into Pyrhus his campe, where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the campe, vvither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriual found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, vvith desire to see eye on him. His face was not so vvell knowne as his Helmet, therefore hee was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and vvottered their seruice, neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius, onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and thise for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorly, did fearfully steale away out of his owne campe, deseruing well this calamity: whether it were so, that he would not harken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behaviour dejected him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessity much.

Whilst Pyrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon, Lysimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and vvould needs haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrhus in the warre; and therefore had reason, to challenge his part of the gaue. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the vvhole, as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all vvpon better opportunity.

Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things vvith ill success, in Greece and Asia. Hee vvvas driuen vvith Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His happy ment and death.

The Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduerity, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vvnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that hee had soone gotten an Army, though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Lady) did poyson her selfe: vpon desperate griefe for his misfortune. The first vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spoked-man, & taking faire words in stead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with euen thousand Souldiers; meaning to trie his fortune against Lyfimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Capitaines that fell from Lyfimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the sonne of Lyfimachus, came vpon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters: The execution of this counsaile was grieuouly impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close; and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublefome Enemy: neuertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore ritularly King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Euxus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance, but were driuen to trauaile with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilence diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Capitaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand; to lay claime to the Country; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them, of which none took effect, though the licentiousness of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length, necessity took and held him forty daies; in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding, he still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his continuing being discouered by fugitives, that gaue alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for euery some of those few forsooke him to yield vnto Seleucus).

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his iaculous thoughts, and hindered him from admitting Demetrius to his presence; though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a deny Island; wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchardes, and Parks for hunting. Hee had all that he asked royally; and friends allowed to visit him, at his; and their pleasure. Only his liberty was refused: vntill the coming of young Antiochus and Siracenus, one of the high Countieues. In this Isle he spent three yeares, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and blood-shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then dyed, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the fane which his father had left vnto himselfe: that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Country; his children haue attained in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

S. I. X.

The death of Ptolemy, of Lyfimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Capitaines: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolemy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolemy Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolemy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolemy) was grieuouly incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Capitaines left, Seleucus and Lyfimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liuet of that braue Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was, their neere equality of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lyfimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest son: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, began to harken so well to Lyfimachus, their naturall Country-man, that they forsooke Pyrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gaue him. Lyfimachus had reigned about sixty yeares alone, when the City of Lyfimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeared by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iaculosity, and the indignation of a Mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his Son Agathocles; which drew vpon him that War, wherein (after the losse of all his fittcen children that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lyfimachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the warre with Lyfimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Herodes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered World. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his dayes, and within leauen Moneths followed Lyfimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolemy Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron hee had bin. Seuentie and seuen year old he was, when he fought with Lyfimachus, and Lyfimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Capitaines, that had seen the daies as it were of another World vnder the Persian: yet was there left one so equall to any of them in the Art of Warre: euen Pyrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before, that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe did euer encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to come in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successours, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome: and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

S. I.

From the Romanes enlarged their Dominion in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Phrythius.

ow Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength, vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italy, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue been deliuered in the ages, wherein they were generally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two & thirty years was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchilde to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris; & the City of Ostia vpon the Sea, fiftene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeares, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damarinus, a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, & dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of vvhich Towne he was afterwards called Tarquinii. From that City in Hetruria comming to Rome, & encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife Tanaquil prophesy, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Romane Court, in suchmanner that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquiniius had reigned eight and thirty yeares, he was slaine by the sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving ⁴⁰ who was done, comforted the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sick; but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the issue of his sickness, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes; (the sonne of Publiculus and Ocrifus, a well descended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recovery: vvhich gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, hee managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had been a priuate household. At length, hauing ⁵⁰ two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous; and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquiniius Priscus, Sextus and Annis, which had bene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Annis the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where hee thought by authority to haue bridled insolency) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned forty and foure years. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquiniius Superbus king; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquinius, exercising cruelty without iustice, and tyranny without mercy, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vied the same rage of treachery vpon his borders. He tooke Orciculum, Suefla, ¹⁰ Pometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eightene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heat of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquiniius violently rauished that chaste Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatius wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her owne blood; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatius, & Immius Brutus) she kil'd her self: whereupon (chiefly by Immius Brutus his resolution) Tarquiniius Superbus, with his wife and children, was deposed and banished; and fled to Perseus king of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth year of his reigne, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fiftene miles round about her.

Immius Brutus by the helpe of Collatius, hauing expelled Tarquinius, and freed his Country from that heauie yoke of bondage, enforced the people by soleme oath, neuer to ¹⁵ admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatius. But because the name of King was odious in their cares, they changed the manner of their gouernment; from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double; lest perpetuall or sole dominion might bee some motive to vsurpation; & in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to bee ²⁰ alwayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard feeling of troubled warre, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne security, enforced Tarquiniius Collatius to religne vp his authority, fearing that tyranny would bee hereditary, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquinius, shauoured already of their condition. In his room was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gaue liberty, in matters of controersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in person, auoide occasion of suspicion, caused his owne house to bee pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had bene a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their ²⁵ honour: for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished kings; hee called them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integrity of Brutus, wel appeased all ³⁰ inuol quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their military designements against Fortunius, first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betwene Latium and the Tuscans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbours; vvhich maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borderers, shee vied them as in ³⁵ arguments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeere of Consuls, was against Perseus king of Hetruria: who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquiniius lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished king, and with great forces, to scare him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Coclus, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies on the bridge ouer Tybris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behind him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping ⁴⁰ into into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hop spirits, and returned safe to his followers, with the like resolution to sustain a ninth day's warre, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill. Quintus Fabius, although by this he found the victory, in a manner, assured by his purpose, yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Maxim, Scipio, who having by error slain Porcena his Secretary, instead of the King himself, did begin to receive threats, borne off his myne hand, he thought it not any while judicial, whether to his safety or credit, to engage with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen, was not quite abated, though Arms his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, moved the solle pshun one whole yeare, until his place for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia (and in his ryme (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Virgatus.)

Tarquinius upon his overthrow, seeing the faces disfigured, thought it no more to fight against the freemen, but spent the residue of his time which was but four years, in privacy at Tusculum. Yet his sonne in law, Marcius Tullius, (somewhat a testie of those old passions, because Porcena had made peace with the Romans, and desired but that he might have the Tarquines mistreated, and his injuries, and gave himself to the Romans at the Lake Regillum, where the conflict was fiercer, and the issue uncertaine, until Marcius Tullius was the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Soldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the enemies; and Cassius or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded so, that of their battles, that they might run with free violence, to recover againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a representation of Cassius and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to hee eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-bearers of their victory, for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, directed upon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, upon suggestion of some desperate backbiters, shewing themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount, moved by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, at that present occasion; they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeal in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this avowement among themselves, they held continuall wars with the Lutines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volscians and Equi held them longest, who made many of themselves upon the Romans: whereby they loosing both City and land, whole land diction, Coroli.

In this equall quest, T. Manlius got the surname of Capitulinus a name honorable, and derived from a great victory, although, by reason of the poverty of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would have bin ashamed of that title. But yet hee excused bin no occasion of disparagement, had hee not after wards in a great time of dearth, added to sell coine, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate to the people, whereupon, Meccius Mur, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after judgement had shewed him, Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, pressed them to ransome their forces againe; which being continued unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he persecuted in field, so far forth, that hee was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and dyed at such distance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, until his Mother Terentia, & Voluntia his Wife, with a pitifull suite of old women, shewing their griefe better Subjects to their Country, than friends to their Son, and Husband, were able to bring, than was any force of Armes. Henceupon Coriolanus did shew himselfe, was after put to death among the Volscians, a Traitor to his people, in such opportunity (as others (some) living with them, till old age, had beene, and had not beene, yet

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, provoked the Romans, against whom the Habit three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Family, increased and obtained, that they obly might be employed, as it had bin in a private quarrell. These Babii, after some good services, being incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all slaine; one only of them whole house, had bin left, by reason of infancie, at home, from whom after ward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had bene discomfited, had not Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, & freed his Countrey in the space of sixteen daies. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Governours of the State, and inactors of Salon's lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, & all other Magistracies) would have ravished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginii, Captaine of a company, and lying then in Campa at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an uproare, broke the Hill Algidum, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war, against the Vientes, and their adherents, upon whom having tried their forces, with diversitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and Ardea Fringetes, and vterly subdued the Vientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus showed no lesse integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yielding them all up as Hostages: Camillus delivred his Traitor bound unto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie, which forthwith yielded unto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Veij was ten yeares, and so trouble some, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) & to make vowes to returne without victorie.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they consecrated their riches to Apollo Pythius: & the whole people in general, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his service, than before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoiles: yet he requied their unkindnesse with a new peece of service, against the fury of the Gauls, who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the finnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roave abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, ser upon Clusium, a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information, (and being careful of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such inuasive enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some iniurie offered by the Romane Embassadors, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Allen'sis in the Romane Calendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leaving the Citie, some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and every one flitting for himselfe, ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their feuerall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, & ready to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke upon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senatours, they late in their Maiestic, with a graue resolution: having

Having first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would dye like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rissled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen moneths. Once they were like to haue surprized it by night, but being deserted by the gagling of Geefe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in weighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their weights too heauie: Brennus, their Capitaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cauilling came Furius Camillus, with to an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoyles with aduantage, and forbore the gold in accepting which, they had lately benee for nice. Further hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like illsuccesse. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a feuerall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their government from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill disension interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Consular authoritie was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares let forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuoure the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papirii and Fabij were most employed in the managing of this warre; which endured the space of fiftie yeeres. And in this season were the Romans of trentines dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Garges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papirius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Counties, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betweene the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equall freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yeerely chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to bee all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great batraile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the General in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consull, exposed his life to the Enemy, and purchased victorie (as was belceued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himselfe for his Arme, the sonne of this Decius being after Consull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre, But (as Tullius well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decij, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countie. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Capitaine of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adu ventured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consull, waisting all their Countie with fire and sword, from the Rhaet Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subiection.

The last of the Italians, that made trial of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediators, betweene the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse peace, by them tendered. These threats which discovered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Bruicians, and Apulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which already, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which hee abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. Hee had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vast settled citate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius, had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serue to giue some hinderance to Lysimachus.

In this want of employment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fildy to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide than his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves vnder his protection. They had in their company, some of the Samnites; Lucanians, Messapians, and others, which promised, in behalfe of their feuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cynaeus his chiefe Counsaillour, asking what hee meant to doe after euery one of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would soone bee Master of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Ile of Sicily; that, out of Sicill, he would passe over into AFRICA, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie, and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, he would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But CYNUS enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (vnderstanding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as CYNUS then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if hee could be contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirty thousand men, well fortified, and well trained to Soldiers: part of which he sent thorow before him vnder CYNUS, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vnterly careless to prouide for the War, Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Whilest hee was occupied with these cares, LENIUS the Romane Consull drew neere, and began to waste Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Countrie, the Samnites were careless of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrink, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now drinen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Itallie, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiency, which by all meanes hee was carefull to vphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which hee resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

LENIUS the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and gaue him battaile, ere all his adherents should bee ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell betwene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, hee were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hercupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the Riuer of Siris: LENIUS intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that hee had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that hee might not bee compelled to fight, vntill hee saw his best aduantage. But hee quickly found, that this new enemy was not onely skilfull in the Art of war, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Armie entered the Poord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, began to passe the Riuer, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Armie had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his batailles, himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooued him indeed to do his best; for he neuer met with better

opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but hee perceiuing it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romanes their vaine ioy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as onely speare and sword were vsed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnusual forme & terrible aspect, the horses of the Romanes (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman batailles, perceiuing their horse put to rout, and druen out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and ouer-borne, by the force and huge bulke of those strange beasts; gaue way to necessity, and saued themselves, as well as they could, by hastic flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ran quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soon spread ouer Itallie; and the reputation was no lesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to beheard, that a Roman Consull, with a select Armie, should lose in plaine battaile, not onely the Field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, saue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans & Samnites, for comming (as we say) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, hee wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them CYNUS his Embassadour, demanding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especial friend. This did CYNUS, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could bee found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captiues, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senatour, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that CYNUS made at his return, of the Roman puissance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed between them: but still when he vied his motion of peace, the answer was, He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for war; the Romanes leuying a more mighty army than the former; & Pyrrhus being strengthened with accessse vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so ioyful as the former had been: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romanes into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of preuailling against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should be drinen to spend vpon his old stock. Neither could he expect, that his Elephants should alwaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soon teach the Romanes, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them vnseruiceable. Wherefore hee desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to doe (seeing the Romanes would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) hee took a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsake Italie; was the most of the Ile; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romanes, and so goes backe to his own Kingdome.

When Ptolomie Cerannus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor & Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lyfimachus in Europe, as if they had bin the due reward vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lyfimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himself against Cerannus. The friends of Lyfimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Cerannus: perswading themselves that his reigne might proue good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the kingdome. As for Antigonus the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie nere vnto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to reuenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in money than in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three stroue about the kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting mony of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to haue them restored at two yeares end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enjoy his kingdome.

Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Asin his sister, the widow of Lyfimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her heircumuenied by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adoept her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere hee slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that he neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Cerannus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrey, to seeke new feares in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lye on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Cerannus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue: His answer was, That he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeelde vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, That they would soone confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proude words. It may seeme strange, that he, who had giuen away part of his Army vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should bee so confident in vndertaking more mighty enemies. The king of the Dardanians offered to lend him twentie thousand men against the Gaules: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against all the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not onely equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battell continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vter astonishment.

Thereport of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole countrey as lost. Onely Sophanes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vjing the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King, which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs doe seldome come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gaules, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot and fifteen thousand horse; against which mightie Army, when Sophanes with his weaker troops made opposition, hee was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their wals, leauing all their Countrey to the spoyle of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a king, & troden down by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse than fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue vnkown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had been too little for a king of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romanes; had not other tydings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursuite of deeper hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned ouer the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had bene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoyde slauiery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, beeing a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to lye vnder the well knowne heauie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the business of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleered (as came after to passe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicill transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselves, yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Town, to hold them in subiection.

As his departure out of Italy, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note-worthy. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foote, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soon after his descent into Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Maeritines in battell; he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sistrax (to whom his cruelty was suspect) out of the Island, & put Theron of Syracuse to death, being iealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he serued himselfe, and salued the disreputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well-neere dispossessed them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, he embarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it selfe, by eightheene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forced him out of Italy, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant, and had hee beene but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one countrey or kingdome, it was to bee thought, that hee would haue purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valiantier man, hath beene nowhere found. But hee neuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after hee died in Argos.

How Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

THe vertue of Solthenes being too weake to defend the kingdome of Macedon, and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the gouernment of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and Treasure becoming a king, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vse against the Barbarians, onely those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wishes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoyle the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behind him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not beidle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellowes: and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Cerannus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet hee iudged it vsfit to exasperate their furious choler, by vncourteous words or vllage, as Cerannus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore hee entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein hee exposed to their view, such abundance of massie gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them understand, how great a Prince hee was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them his Campe and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauery serued onely to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heauie laden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, him selfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior vnto the Gaules, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend their riches which they accomplished assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoyle and purchase: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his campe, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory ouer Cerannus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who, distrustful the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arriual, and conueighed him selfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where hee lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Campe forsaken, were not hastie to pursue him, but fell to rancking the empirie Cablines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilest he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation: For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoyle of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had saved it selfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war: who discovering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies,ooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold vpon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, banding together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countreies, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armies of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countreies which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet hee knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard tearmes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was hee forced, either a supply, wherewith to continue his warre against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauery, meer necessity forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

Hee brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoyle hee could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers revolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus him selfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warrior; but thought in the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrhus overtooke him in a streight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest prooffe that he was in retreat. The Gaules very brauely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour,ooke away their courage by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gaules, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that hee aduentured adventured to draw neere in person, and exhort them to yeelde. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to leuie it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his seruice; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, draue him to fflye from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which hee had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epiror, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

Now Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprize vpon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to bee set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what hee pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection; though it was easily discouered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, than warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vtterly dejected. Especially the Lacedaemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that hee bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne younger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a iest; That hee followed herein the Lacedaemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised in wisdom, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to rescue themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this, (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower & more acceffible places, were fenced with wals; at the present, only trenches were cast, & barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preferred the Town the first dayes; vnder the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindefull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had come in sunder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arcus the king returned out of Crete (where hee had bene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Countrie stood, vntill hee was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kinde in Pyrrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had bene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that hee saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course hee had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprize in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise to deliuer that City into his hands.

Ciuill dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seuerall factions to call in Pyrrhus & Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerful Assistants, as each of the two kings pretended himselfe to bee. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to saue them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus: and that hee would bee gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needes perswade them, that hee had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argiues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hercunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue Hostages to assure his word: for hee was the weaker, and stood in neede of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages hee would giue none, to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to bee such, as, indeede, it was. Yet hee lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should bee opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those towers, with the trouble thereto belonging; did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leasure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the wayes, in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noyse, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darknesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then began hee to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeepe, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the City, though the Wolfe and Bull had bene away. The tumult was such; that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue backe, so did others thrust forward, and the Argiues pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne (sword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne son in dangrous case; fighting with Pyrrhus: Wherefore, she took a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow, and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Words:

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the body, and the children of his enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was given by Antigonus vnto Helenus his son; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posterity of Solomon reigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolonie had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such tyme, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

Abiusion of that probleme of Liuius; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THAT question handled by Liuius, whether the great Alexander could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Eastern conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bin, & is, the subiect of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides doe not so well expaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen of the Roman power, in his dayes. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, thought to none else, could with small strength of men, & little store of money, or of other needfull helpes in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their Estate, when it was well setled, & held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of employment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well setled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, & foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more,) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiaticques. But he that considers the Armes of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes Ptolonie, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded onely some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punicke warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how faire too weak they would haue proved in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not wel deserue to be layd in ballance, against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeede, than valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: let vs onely coniecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, neere neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue fild affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Grecians, neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselves vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that Alexanders comming into those parts, would haue brought excessive ioy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subiects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africke, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall we thinke that they would haue bene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadors, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neere them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vnease to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whosoeler contends with one too mightie for him; either must succell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouercome, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Linie hath iudged this a matter worthy of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Linie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equall to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our iudgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinks it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini, that stroue about a piece of land, saying, That it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no sauage or vnmanly people; the enemy being farre superiour vnto vs in number, and all needfull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In

In what sort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Parsons and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what sorte the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very seldom, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater vlt, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons, and that they, of whom she had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that she was neuer ouer-laid with too great warres at once.

Herby it came to passe, that hauing at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines, hauing won the State of Alba, against which the aduentured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latium: she did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppressed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their own doores. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Ætolians. The warres against Antiochus, and other Asiaticques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boast, though much of ioy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicill, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by vsing her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say: That among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my iudgement seeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore it is well knowne, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Julius Cesar: and that no Roman armie was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Cesar. Likewise, it is apparant, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian warre, when it first entred into Gaul, was neuertheless vtterly disheartned, when Cesar led it against the Germans. So that we may iustly impute, all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cesars men, to their long exercise, vnder so good a Leader, in so great a war. Now let vs in general, compare with the decdes done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall seruice, the things performed in the same Countrey, by our common English Souldiers, leui'd in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fauily, and belecue Cesar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Cesars time, France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them assistance. The Countrey of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Cesar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not onely in general through the whole Countrey, but betweene the petty States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Ariusius, with his Germans, had ouer-run the Countrey, and held much part of it in subiection, little different from meere slavery: yea, so often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gauls, that the Gauls (who had sometimes bene the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France bene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this this time, would haue bin ours. But when King Edward the third began his warre upon France, he found the whole Countrey fetled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Geneways, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for money. The Countrey lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater prooue of military vertue. Caesar himselfe doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their own hardinesse was ouer-mastered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their wals, as more than humane vvorkes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worse, by small numbers of Spaniards. Besides all this, we are to have regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows; and sometimes driuen, to give or take battaile, vpon extreme disadvantages, for feare, lest their Companies should fall asunder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were ready to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (vvhich was little lesse than all this) great oddes in vweapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or vvhat other vvorldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs? Let vs heare, what a French writer faith, of the inegalitie that was betweene the French and English, when their King Iohn was ready to giue the on-set, vpon the Duke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. Iohn had all advantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, Countrey, and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had furrowed with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriors. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scythians, as Linie rightly teames them, nor those cowardly Kings Perses and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that have read of Croesus and Agincourt, will beare me witness, that I doe not alliege the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the prooue whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weaknesse or sicknesse, or a sore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all obiection: for vvhen two Armies are vvithin the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in generally true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceeth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arme, whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then then came it to passe, that the English won so many great battailes, having no advantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historians: who relating the victory of our men at Crenant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words: The English comes with a conquering braverie, as he, that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any slay: he forceth our garde, placed upon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where he tells, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and five hundred of their owne men in English Callocks; hoping that the vety sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Amylin, report wonders of our Nation: the proposition vvhich he I vnderooke to maintaine; That the military vertue of the English, preuailling against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, vvich was desired vvith all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Caesar had done? my answer may be (I hope vvithout offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Asacide, of vvhom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Brillipantes sunt magis quam sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: save onely King Henrie the fifth, the course of vvhom victories pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaul, before the time of Caesar? why not after the Macedonian war? why not after the third Punic, or after the Numidian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit opportunitie, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by vvhom the Countrey of Gaul had bin piously wasted. Surely the words of Iulius were true; that vvith other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion, vvith the Gauls, for preservation of their owne safetie. Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaul, vntill they were Lords of all other Countreies, to them knowne. We on the other side, held onely the one halfe of our owne land; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vvell perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) euery way equal to our felues; a Nation anciently and trogly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backes, vvhere commonly we felt, alvvays we feared, a stronger inuasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces over Sea.

It is vvithall, vvith men, that haue pleased themselves, in admiring the matters vvich they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their iudgement, if any vvill vvpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am vvell persuaded, that as the diuident vertue of this our land, hath giuen more noble prooue of vvirtue, than vnder to vvorthy a Leader, that Roman Armie could do, vvhich afterwards vvon Rome, and all her Empire, making Caesar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, vvho shall conuerted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, vvill finde cause to vvish, that auoiding vs, he had rather encountered a great puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, vvhen vvaying a side comparisons, we returne to the rehearsal of deeds done: vvherein we shall see, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to strue vvith Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punic warre.

§. II.

The state of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

THE Cite of Carthage had stood about fixe hundred yeares, vvhen first it began to contend vvith Rome, for the mastic of Sicill. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great achievements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the strights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, vvherein stood three hundred Cities, and had subiected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together vvith all the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicill; and of Sicill, the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirty yeares, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other Ipoyles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence foure hundred and seuentie thousand weight of siluer, which make of our mony (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie ran the same fortune, vvhich many other great ones haue done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the vvhole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and re-peopled, taken and retaken; by Genfericus the Pandal, by Belisarius vnder Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Alahomans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, sauing that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleue the common report, that the Citie it selfe was about twenty miles in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue been twice as great.

It had three wals, without the wall of the Citie; and betwene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, & Granaries for their prouender. They had also lodgings in these streets, betwene these out-walles for foure thousand horse-men, and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by those of China) neuer pelted the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa, to which Seruius giues two and twentie furlongs in compass, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when she got leaue to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Ox-hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastned to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but seuentie foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenall, hauing their ships and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common-weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had timularie Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well obserueth) the people in later times vsurped too great authoritie in their Councils. This confusion in gouernement, together with the wust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their auarice and their cruelty. Their auarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle & mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendred them odious to their vassals, whom it made ready vpon all occasions to revolt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse recovered, haue desperately cast theiues with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction, holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared to manage their owne best proiects, after that good form; wherein they first conceived them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the vnhappy Captaine, but euén him, whose bad counsaile had prospered euén. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, auarice, craft, vnfaithfulness, and periuie. Whether the Romans rr. But I may say, that they are more free now than ours: and our Nobilitie and Gentrie more feeble.

ss. For, since the excellent brauerie, and vaunt experience of our Countie, hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by Inclosures, and dismembering of Mannours, the Countie of the Gentrie of England haue bene diminished, the Tenants, hauing payed vnto their Lords their racke Rent, once, haue now no reuerce at all, and patience a little loue.

themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred vnto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing bin made, the year following the expulsion of Tarquinius. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Africk, nor suffer any ship of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, vntill it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Linie to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to haue trade in any part of Africk, or in the land of Sardinia.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africk; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italie, whereby they themselves might haue the better meanes to occupie all Sicill, vvhilst that land should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we find good cause, of the ioy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, vvhén the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, was only two Cities therein: many great fleets were decoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, & take reuenge vpon those Inuaders. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole land in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie, in making their advantage, of this good opportunity, Pyrrhus (impited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where he made sharp warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, vvhich had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome, vvhó declared in their name, that they were sorry to heare, vvhát misadventure had befallen the Romans; their good friends, in this vvar with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italie, if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirites.

It was indeed, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicill: vvhich caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken longingly, as it ought; and the former league betwene Rome and Carthage renewed, with counsaunts added, concerning the present business; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reseruatiou of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vsing all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a steppe into Sicill: whosé, though in fine he was neither getter nor sauer, yet he cleane defeated the policies of Carthage, leauing them at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters, in an enterprize, that from the first vndertaking had bin so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleue, that an higher prouidence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull land, was so inueterate, that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bin the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and

and by force of practice, recovered in few yeares, all their old possitions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, & finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe wrong: and with perfidious crueltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that mere desperation, of finding any that would approue their barbarous treachery, added rage vnto their stoutnesse. Hauing therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouer-ranne all the Countrie round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicill Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbor places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her backe to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast vpon them, & finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Gouernors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Armie elected two Gouernours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie he vsed, at his first entrance, vvas by generall consent established and made Gouernour. This Officē, he rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to climbe to some higher degree, than rested content with his present prefferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat with out it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troupes of Souldiers without, often and easily mooued to sedition & tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, he tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie; and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assailed it in two severall parts, he marched away vnder the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and leauing an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, he halted againe towards Messana, & was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victorie over the Mutiners) encountered in the plaines of Asylum, where he obtained a most glorious victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent, was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves vtterly inebbled, some of them resolved to giue themselves to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the severall factitious dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone ready to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they had sent for him, gaue him possession. But within a litle while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne reserved for other Matters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage, who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messana, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once bin theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the

Mamertines

Mamertines out of Sicill. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whilst Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Armie to the straits of Sicill: which passing by night with notable audacitie; he put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to giue them protection, even by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the vvarre betweene Rome and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, haue beene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick Warre. That it was vnjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus began his wars in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirots, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, & obtained from them a Legion, consisting of 4. thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended & assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering a good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, a Citie in Sicill, situate almost opposit to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which ferueth it from Italie, and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained in their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more seuerer profession of iustice; than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolved, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former libertie and estates.

This execution of Iustice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it vvas, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that villanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioint forces to make it good, doe intreat the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow-theeues.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the vway of honestie or of profit, were to be followed; they euermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsells and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spain; and some part of Sicill itselfe, whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein therein seated (a Citie in beauty and riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver vp Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betwene Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicily: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not onely debarre all succours out of the continent, from arriual in Sicily; but would serue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre, did so preuaile, about all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatched away from Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arriual; and lesse moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Island was ready to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this he thought the stiffemetal of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remedie. Therefore, he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming vvvas to send them away from the Towne; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, wherein to he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusians wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had made notriall, when it had bene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honor, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and driven to saue himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bin taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooued him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Campe, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countrey open to the Romans; who hauing spoyled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had bin prepared against the Mamertines alone, vvithout any suspicion of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it reasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreable to rules of honesty (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulness; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romane hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendrie, in the publike name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendrie of themselves and their possessions, were become subiect vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point seruing to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeves, Out-lawes, Murderers, or such other malefactors, can by any good successe of their villanie, obtaine the priuiledge of ciuill societies, to make league or truce, yea or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Ciuilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to such as these, as long as any other is vsing the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessory to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being iustificable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeves, into their protection, they iustly deserved to be warped vpon themselves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Messana had bin taken, and the Mamertines all slaine, ere any newes of the Confederacie had beene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre persuaded heerein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiade (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they ioyfully entertained him as their Lord and King, because they were descended from a Companie of Milesians, who to gratifie king Ionas, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countie, which these of their posteritie enioyed. Neuertheless, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues ius acquisitum, a kind of right by prescription, vnto that which was first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmond Iron-side. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of iustice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

Of the Island of Sicil,

§. I.

The qualitie of the Island: and the first inhabitants thereof.

THE defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases wee haue obserued, to make a brieue collection, of things, concerning that noble Island, which hath beene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

That

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adioyned to Italie, as a part of Bruttium in Calabria, neere vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remaining, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Silius and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue bene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and furies of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Enbea severed from Bentia; Atalante and Alacria, from Iubaea; Siclie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Vesilegath's arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaul. But for Sicil, they which lend their cares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Nephtune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iachin, the sonne of Aeolus, diuided it from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that meanes, he might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of fundering it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Enslathin and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soyle. As concerning the forme of this Island, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old written with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of sowing and fowing of Corne: to Proserpina, not so much, for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as she, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrey, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it, the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place, that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome; but also that it was a well-furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually clothed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperance of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-grown with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Island, wheat doth grow of it selfe without any labour, or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scattering in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Island, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Aetna, Scylla, & Charybdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Leitriopones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill, all histories and fables doe ioynly with one consent affirme. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Island. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bredde in the Isle (although some so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Siculi, who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelagi from their owne seats, and finding no place vpon the Continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Island, three hundred yeeres before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eighty yeeres before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Island; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Messina; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it selfe, beating from thence the Aetolians, who long before had seuerall Townes in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such times as Archimedes of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Island from the Siculi. Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Aetolians thereof, but some 10 hundred yeeres after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Naxos, Hybla, Trynacia, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another nation out of Italy, called Morgetes, who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill war greatly infuebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet: Thucydides, an Historian of vnquestionable veritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Islands; and some such businesse, perhaps drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Daedalus. The tale goes thus: Daedalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, king of the Sicani, & during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set vp in the Temple of Venus Erycina, which hee did with so great Art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to bee liuing, than counterfeite.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Daedalus, prepares to invade the Territories of Cocalus; but when he was arriued, Cocalus doubting his owne strength, promised to deliuer Daedalus. This he performs not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil: the better (as it seems) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engium, now called Gange; and these were the first Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos serued with the Greekes at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason benee made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they besieged the same five yeeres, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie, and having no means to repaire their ships, nor the honour they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betwene the two famous Ports of Brundisium & Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Messapii.

After the taking of Troy, Agellus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troops into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Agellia and Elyma.

It is said, that Encas visited these places in his passage into Italie; and that some of the Troians, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Encas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phoenicians seized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, & Lilybaeum, & vpon certaine small Isles adioyning to the maine Island: which they fortified, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians, like as the Portugals haue done in the East India, at Goa, Ornaus, Mosambique; and other places. But the Phoenicians staid not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Palerminus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy; and ere the Greekes in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perhaps seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes one

This discourse I could also recite for fained and fabulous; did not Moses make vs know, that the Zainzummims, Emlims, Anakims, and Op of Bafan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountains and Defarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants; and were it not, that Tertulian, *S. Yea, Vespasian, in his conſtant Navigation into America, hath reported, that himſelfe hath ſcene the like men in thoſe parts. Againe, whereas the ſelfe ſame is written of all Nations, that is written of any one, as touching their ſimplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acorns and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies with the ſkins of beaſts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their firſt paſſages over great Riuer, & armes of the Sea, upon rafts of trees tied together, and afterward, their making boats, firſt of twigs and leather, then of wood, firſt, with Oares, & then with Sailes, that they eſteemed as gods, the firſt finders out of Arts, as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Politie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they alſo liued in the ſame newneſſe of time, which we call Old time, and had all the ſame want of the inſtruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were remoued farre off from the Iſraelites, (who inherited the knowledge of the firſt Patriarchs.) than that from vaniſh effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the cauſes: from whence came Philophic Naturall, as the Morall did from diſorder and conſuſion; and the Law from crueltie and oppreſſion.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie: For wee haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniquitie, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength, for cottages, and houses of clay and timber, we haue raised Palaces of Stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold, in so much as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dieths, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenness; from the couering of our bodies with the skinned of beasts, not onely to silk and gold, but to the very skinned of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will take reuenge of the excess, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, langior, auius, longissima subest; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and time longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

†. II.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

compass (as Sir Arcepereth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs, which make of our miles about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Sirba faith, of Buë) to wit, Arbus, Acradina, Thebes, and Syracusa.

When the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driuen vpon that coast by an Easterly wind; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had bene thought fabulous, being deliered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, & proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Calambus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Calambus afterwards did. He ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and indutrious, by whom his proiect was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Eubaeans.

But the rest of the Greekes were wifer than our western Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the void places of the World. Archib. of Corinth followed the Eubœans, & landed in Sicil, nere vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracuse of which, that part onely was then compassed with a wall, which the Ærolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouercome the Siculi, draue them vp into the Country; and after a few years, their multitudes increasing, they added vnto the City of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Hauen of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the soyle, Syracuse grew vp in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greeks did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast, forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in Trinacia.

Some seven yeares after the arriual of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the 10 successe of the Corinthians, did assaile, and obtaine the city of Leontium, built and possessed by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Associates, the cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About 45 years after Archias had taken Syracuse, Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela, whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

10 The Syracusians also, in the fuentieyth year after their plantation, did set vp the city of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the nineteenth year Casimena, in the Plaines adjoining; and againe in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracufe, they built Camerina; & soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Siculi the city of Zancle, which they had founded in the freight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had beene the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorians the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were again ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians, who having lost their owne Country, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest cities in this Iland.

t. III.

Of the government and affaires of Sicil, before Dionysius his Tyranny.

THE most part of the cities in Sicily, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of brasse, wherein to inclose men, and scorch them to death : praising the deuife with this commendation ; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour, by causing the first triall to be made vpon himselfe. He reigned one and thirty yeares, saith Eufebius ; others giue him but sixteene : Howsoeuer it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death ; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thersiphrus usurped the government of the Common-wealth : at which time also Panastus made himselfe Lord of Leontium, & Cleander, of Gela : but Cleander, having ruled 7⁵⁰ years, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hypocrates succeeded in his room, & greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messina, and of Leontium, with whom with diuers others of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when hee had reigned seuen years, he was slaine in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of government, from Popular to Aristocratical: a preparation towards a Principality, wherinto it was soon after changed.

Paul. 1. 6.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, feared themselves in Sicily) had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, betwene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Gouvernours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change happened in the second yeere of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agrigentum.

Herd. & Dio.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasylulus: to the first of which he gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalltie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouercame; the richer sort he brought vnto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaues. In like manner dealt hee with other places vpon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, hauing dispossest Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messina, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon; and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellespont. He, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee vied to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring withered, accounting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greeke Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of siluer, and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not onely willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata, Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successor his brother Hiero. Philistius and Plinius report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasylulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conuersation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Grecians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasidamus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned 11. yeeres, he left the kingdom to his brother Thrasylulus, who became a most vniust & bloody Tyrant. Thrasylulus inioyed his Principalltie no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, hee was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom being besieged in Acragas, he restored the gouernement, and was banished the Island. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Successors of Gelon inberited his vertue, as they did the Principallty of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the presentie ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberrall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignity of a Prince; it behooueth the Successor to maintain it by the same way and art by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere that shee could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well nere threescore yeeres, to the time of Dionysius, though she were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Timoclea.

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they deuised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new deuised iudgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein euerie one wrote vpon an Olive leafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the City. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeeres. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe that those of iudgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able; either suppressed, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had so to doe, seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wisest sort vnto the Gouernement; from which, the Nobility hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, king of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Syracusa, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Army of the Agrigentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Dolon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as hee did to flee from the Army he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they leuie other troups: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitted himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned againe, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse; Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enioy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aide from the Athenians, about the fixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre; In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Chararodes. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Euryclides, and other Athenian Captains, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wane and lost diuers places; tooke Messina, and, in the seventh yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, & yet could see none issue of the warre, the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted admitted into their society: with PAULI the Sicilian. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatened themselves in Sicily by the dissolution and civil warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking revenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophicles, and laid an heauie fine vpon Euryon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable war, that euer was made by the Greeks in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines & Syracusians, in fauour of the cities of Egesta, Leontium, & Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestians; & they of Syracuse the Leontines, & the Catanians: which was the ground of the war. For, the Athenians vnderooke the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedaemon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedaemonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleefe their owne eyes; which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the city of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not onely the greatnesse of the enterprize, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedaemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open war. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forebare it: which was likely to be hindred by warres at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians blinde passion, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, to and to reserve their forces for a more needfull vse. But young counsailes preuailed against the authority of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safety than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene already made, in that which vce haue written of the Peloponnesian war. But what was there deliuered in general termes, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to haue felt a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage, yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission & direction, as well to succour the Segestans, & to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of armes, to subiect the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and fise thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burthen, which transported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the war: and these were Athenians, Mantineaes, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horse-men.

With these troups & fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to giue them entry; but sell them victuals for their money. From thence they sent to the Egestians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egestians were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias aduised to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them to an agreement with the Egestians: as likewise to see what disbursements the Egestians could make, and to returne a promise to Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse war. Alcibiades, on the other hand, would sollicite the cities of Sicily to confederacy against the Syracusians & Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus the perswades them to assaile Syracuse itself, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surpris'd Catana; & there they take new resolution, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egesta, who receiued from them thirty talents towards his charges; & one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the spoils they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians, to make his answer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neere vnto Syracuse, by this device.

They imploie to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; & instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire ebbe, & fortifie themselves against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, & the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the winter season. From thence they made an attempt vpon Messina, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messenians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens, the Athenians, because they had recalled him from his command; with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: wherof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedaemonians, & to them he gaue mischeuous counsaile against his country. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusians sent Embassadors to Lacedaemon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicily, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicily, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, for assistance of the Inhabitants; from whence foraging the Country, they obtaine some small victuals, and the dragging Syracusians: & as their returne to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestans, and other their adherents; they were also strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and encamp neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any factors could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiued others losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the mean while, Gylippus, & Pythos, with the Lacedaemonian, and Corinthian forces arriv'd, and take land at Himera. The Citizens of Himera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, ioyned with them; so that with these and his own troups, Gylippus aduanced to march ouer land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians sent a part of their forces to meet him, & conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his actual onere vnto the City, vpon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to fight in those strights; but to one after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and commanded Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the loss of his affaires knowne, by his letters to the Athenians, shewing that, without great succour by Sea & Land, the enterprize would be lost, together with the imployment remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Euryon, and Demosthenes, to ioyne with Nicias, the one they dispatch presently with some shipping, the other they send after him in the Spring following. In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, near to Syracuse, the Promontory, called Plumyria; where, in the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, & that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, & dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarchus the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariflon had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-battle put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the necke of this, Demosthenes arrived with threecore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon, determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arrivall of a new supply in the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, & to lodge at Catania: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill success, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deere: For the Syracusians, Lacedæmonians, & Corinthians, with threecore and seventeen saile of Gallies, entered the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and wheron they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port encountered them with fourecore & fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, & Eurymedon slaine. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more loss by land (for the fight was generally) yet when the Athenians were beaten by sea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians, when any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceede all others, they not onely lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies suncke and wracke, had seventeen taken, and posselt by the enemy: and with great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnaudaciously: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter tooke in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other by close imbattailing.

The Syracusians, having now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolute to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor, filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were forced to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely inhibited themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers to the end, that if any of their Gallies were suncke, or the chaine, which ioyned them to their fellows, broken, the Athenians might yet find themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies & Ships, in chained together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any vessel, wing bare or faille, is broken, and their speede forced slowe, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost except with an invincible resolution, they could make their way; and broke downe this great bulwark of boats, or at least force a passage through them in some part, or other, where they resolved solve to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred & ten, of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopp with the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no room to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-pestered their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place vpon the decks to stretch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To bee short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten backe to the Land, with loss of threecore of their Gallies, broken, suncke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also twenty of theirs, with Pythobus, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, saved themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to set vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsaile. For, as wee haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that haue beene victorious) that haue neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might wee produce many examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosome of good success, have beene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and have thereby lost againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demosthenes: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolute to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, & other the Lacedæmonian & Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, & to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cádiz, lost vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countreimen to any hastie prosecution, devised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time, not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleaved, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly bearen, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, euery thistle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue, being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sicke and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the Riuer of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, & by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from foraging and provision of food, they grow weake and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall backe againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and

and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias vnderooke the leading of the Vanguard; & Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leauing Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Asinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a Noble Enemy to the Lacedaemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receiued at Pylus by the Athenians, had saued the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedaemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army, dissuaded the rest, by all the art he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly fort, (cowardise and cruelty, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue Captaines to bee miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starued in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaues. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the riuer Asinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Eggestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late war had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, & their late victories ouer the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolved vpon the enterprise, & (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Eggestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a businesse, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this employment, that he might take reuenge as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing bin slaine by the Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately bin Generall of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedaemonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great seruice. All the honest fort within Syracuse were sorry for the injury done vnto him, and fought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicily, gathered an Army of sixe thousand; with which he began to repaire Selinus; & by many noble actions laboured to win the the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerser party. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict he was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates alieue againe.

I. IIII.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others following him, in Syracuse.

THE Syracusians had inioyed their liberty about threescore yeeres, from the death of Therapylus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was taisted vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their cruelty towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principallty of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse itselfe. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then began hee to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens, obtaining a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. Hee doubled the pay of his Souldiers, alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these weece afterwards, at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefite. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to reigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their liberty, the bars that held it vnder safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found what hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but siue and twenty yeeres of age when hee obtained it: belike, it was his desire to reigne long. His first work, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell, wherein was much good prouision, & vnder it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare. The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needy sort within Syracuse, that could not thrue by honest courses, and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present, were wholly affected to his assistance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what he had already. Hee strengthened himselfe by diuers marriages, taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom hee had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Artemache, the daughter of Hipparchus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse; which bare vnto him many children, that serued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely gouerned. He had shamefully beene beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wast al, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ransacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof he poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, nor his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barbaro trim him, nor any person, no, nor so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. Hee was the greatest Robber of the people that euer raigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniards did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein hee lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay before Herbelle, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he againe recovered the maiestie ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Townsmen remayning; and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. Hee inclosed that part also, called Epipoles, which, with threecore thousand labourers, he finished in three weekes, being two leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand cosles, and all other futable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, greatly infected by the plague, (That except they would abandon the Greeke Towns, which they held in Sicil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answer, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. Hee then goes to the field with fourecore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, & five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded vnto him; sauing Panormus, Segesta, or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motyæ, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motyæ by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Armie, by a fallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere hee tooke land, hee lost in a night at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and fiftie thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recovered againe Motyæ vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messena, hee took Lypara, and (soon after) Messena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and hee himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer-land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell vs, That one Citie should bee able to furnish five hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should bee slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, wee heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer happened in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the first went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of shippes, and threecore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, hee sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeede, is it often requisite, vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the hauing received aide from the Lacedæmonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacides, purs himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens, who in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill: hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacides the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fel out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that about an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of money; on condition that he should steale away with his Carthaginians onely: which hee basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was persued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; onely the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliuer vnto memory the like practises, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very futable to this trecherie, wherewith Dionysius persued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered S. Iohn d'Angeli, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendered it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set vpon, and broken in his March; spoyle of all that he had; and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand & faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid: and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit auailing him. It needs not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who staid in Sicil, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourecore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercenary Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourecore thousand crownes, to furnish him with twecore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victuall for his Armie, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like qualitie, at his comming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yielded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if hee had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, hee desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hangmans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errors.

And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publike.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that he vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for hee had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their words against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So feared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen moneths, till hee wonne it by force. Hee vsed his victorie without mercy, specially against Physon, who had commanded within it.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and rasing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For, as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptine, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperity and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effluies of his insolie. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and, as our Sauour Christ hath told vs, The world will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdome and his Vices. To win the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Woollfe. For being ialous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Loeris, and Arismache a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Arismache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Saphrosine, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Arete, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Nece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly giuen ouer to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicill, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principallitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Phisistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour, and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicill, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the waite against them: his enemies found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had rendered none other end, than to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilst Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former libertie, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already become rufled and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made; if the King had had the grace to conceiue it aright. But the couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Presumption; and heareened the young King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne People, of whose spoyle they themselves shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the brabest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuid his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to raise himselfe aboue him; and so haue it said. That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected; and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than hee

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his owne pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another course, than to seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men (with whose helpe hee might returne into Sicill). Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for he carried the matter close) to follow him in this aduenture. But many of these were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should bee needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicill, marched to Syracuse, entered the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, saue the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recover the Towne, hee was faine to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates his eldest sonne. Yet hee went, his Minion Phisistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him; was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Effraies. Hee was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troups enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townes men, thinking themselves secure, laid the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater fury than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrie stirring him to all the injuries that hee had receiued. Hee leis upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie; and quenched the fire euer where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after hee had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had wel-neede burne houses, and depopulated Syracuse, hee recovered the Castle, with the submission and surrender thereof; and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom hee had best deserved, and whom hee had loved most, gave an vntimely end to his dayes. For hee was soon after this his victorie, murdered by Gylippus; who, after hee had, with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recouers his estate, and returnes to Syracuse, dringing Nysus thence, whom he found Gouernour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his cruelty, flee to Ictes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ictes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being desperately afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Ictes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Ictes, more enraged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Ictes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he beleegged him.

Ictes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliuer his Countrey. Therefore, bearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in priuate; that hee might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and hauing set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Taormenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprising Ictes his Armie, he slew a part therof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ictes, whom hee disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie dayes, after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a priuate man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ictes. For hee besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are slaid in Italy by foule weather. Ictes is strengthened with threecore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ictes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them viduals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ictes doe therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acra, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ictes, being being frighted out of Sicily (which he might easily haue conquered) without any little rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which hee called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; for as their horse did feed on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, hee writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italy; others, from other parts of the Island.

A new forme of civill, Asarbal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybrum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a River.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boisterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken: ten thousand slaine, five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand Arcturgis and grauen. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Ictes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom hee caused all to be slaine: and afterwards, which was impudently to him for great cruelty, he suffered Ictes his wiues & daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of Godipon Ictes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a young child of his, with Ariflamache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippus, Tyrant of Messina: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne, delivering Hippus to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Agathocles, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not passe the River of Lycus. After this; hee liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeeres after the death of Timoleon, there started vp one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Tyrant; finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes hee had, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalltie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna; and the Campanes, hee did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, hee sackt Leontium; and beleegged Syracuse so strongly, that the Citizens were driven to craue aide, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that hee got him to make peace betweene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and sequent to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; hee entertaines five thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diuided into many factions), hee assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposers; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore, and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to rauen, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewd the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls, their furie had no further subiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common-wealth was vterly consumed, hee found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administered; and that hee affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democraie, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left nohe liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had been partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabbie, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adorning him, by that name, as if it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his patterne; but the one was of base, the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke liberty from a common-wealth; the other fought onely to succeed in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee had obtained the Crowne, fought, by making good lawes, to recover the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Justine; more largely and particularly by Dionorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to sente Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Ile; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that hee should reduce all Sicill into such termes as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the eldes, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (so much raunted by the Romans, as no better than mere falshood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Capitaine appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if other wise hee would not hearken to it. All this ended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such iniuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soone notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that hee had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusan, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authority, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale subtilly and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuires: which if hee could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore hee followed the example, which some of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. Hee dissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoyle and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. Hee had made the better part of Sicill his owne; etc. the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to haue in countrey an ill established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them no hope of entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was so tempest-beaten, that they could either doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africke.

Carthaginians

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned & furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilst it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Giffes, gathering together the remainders of his ship-wracks, was bold to passe ouer into Sicill, and landed not far from Gela, where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betwene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusan had the better. But his good successe begat presumption, whereby hee lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduersie chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vpheld by great circumspection. The war was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercenary Souldiers, infranchised slaues, or base & needie people; helpers in establishing the present Querement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withall) so fearefull, that they durst not stirre. But it was enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie. Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity, Agathocles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the euent commended as wise. He embarked as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauens, and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauens, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuse, to intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheeled about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither shod their coming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all speed towards Africke, and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued, first, that by pursuing two deces at once, he had misfed of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere, hee thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after fixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them; and, hauing funke, or taken many, draue the rest to flee which way they could, laden with such strange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did hee discouer vnto them his purpose, letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not onely fro Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicill, than by bringing the war to their owne doors. For hee (said he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which shal look vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified, their people vntaunted, and and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which wee may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue words encouraged his men so well; that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities, which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terror to all that should make resistance: The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression so distmaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles: But it seldome happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produeth any so fortunate euent. Needlesse draue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not surre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie wineth many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilst he was trauiailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adjoined vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, hee conceived a suddain hope of taking Syracuse by surprize. It was a prettie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that hee should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and hee verily beleueed it. Hee made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrappe him, whereinto hee fell. So hee was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great care to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countie into his hands: for that (as hee said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuented the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and hee so preuailed in Africke, that hee possessed sure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countie. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Of Sicil hee returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Agathocles, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyles. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both money enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had bene distressed, not onely by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorabell in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euent following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappie men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neere vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is vusual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vpon the Paullion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleeming, that the noise in the aduerser Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee began to assault them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost in this blinde fight, about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, hee knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately hee had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to scale closely a-board his shippes, with his younger sonne (the elder hee suspected of Inceest, and of Ambition) and so to flee into Sicil, thinking it the best course to haue for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son, Agathathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by means of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped; and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noyed through the Armie, all was in vpror; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I need not vse words to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriviug him of the succours which reason offered, the sequels dorth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discountured his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vnged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein struing to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of brasle, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs hee was so outrageous, that hee neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was in the midst of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his crown: it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countie, took armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that he was faine to seeke the Citie of Carthage, which by using well hee might haue had in Sicil. Here hee was deliuered livered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phoenicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with four hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terror of his name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Elpara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, hee was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) hee did well enough. For how could hee belecue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Ther-genis (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom onely hee now held deare, which were Ther-genis and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surpris-ed: for that otherwise they could by no means auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but hee ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traitorously occupied Messana, and intested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrey (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsake the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to bee offended with him, for helping himselfe by what means hee could, when they were in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good mood, the new Roman Consul, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they vse of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whiletime of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles; and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to try the vttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as hee might preserve his owne tyranny: the latter, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that hee enjoyed a long and happy reigne, liuing deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vniuersally to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first loss, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fights in generall.

Hieron, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arriue. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of haueit being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the Countrey to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians fallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the Carthaginians, by reason of the sterilitie of the soyle, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plenty and variety thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agrigentines built Palaces of such inuincibility, as if they were to last for euer; and made such feasts as if they meant to die the next day. But their great pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and their aires, water-conduits, and fish-ponds; the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome at leste could neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Iupiter Olympius, (by which wee may iudge of the temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours; a worke most magnificent and rare, that euer hath bene scene: on the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at the siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautiful stune, and of equall stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the later workes of that kinde, are but petty things, and more inlesse. I would giue a volume to expresse the magnificence of the temples of Hercules, Abraham, concord, Iunio Iulio, Castitie, Veritas, Pax, Ar, and Pollux, wherein the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters, and Caruers, Libidius Xenoxus, Nyron, and Polyclitus, were to be scene. But in proceesse of time it ranne the same fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre: this was the present brought vnto it not the least.

Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betwene the walls of the Citie and their Campe : and another on the out-side thereof ; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrey without, breake vpon them vnawares : which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilst the Siracusan supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage : after they had beene in this fort pent vp five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno ; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Eriscus, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum ; and the Roman campe no lesse straightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans : in so much, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise ; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directeth the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on ; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly ; and while the Romanes pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Anibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight : But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, hee lost the day : and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Anibal perceiving this, and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his owne way. Finding therefore, that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night ; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine : sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts : but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily, and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good success, to saile ouer into Africa. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least ; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-lad Towns gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romanes a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke : and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many feates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beate the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery year) was made Admirall : who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messina with fiftie Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hanno, a Carthaginian was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus ; who being aduertised of this new Sea mans arriuall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consul vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consul ; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had bin. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided ; sought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile : wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten ; and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but fiftie, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse (such as their Mariners craft ; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open) so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady ; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen between one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a Long-boat.

Certainly, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in : he must beleue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during ; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clasp ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre : for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroffie, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, beene lost in the yeere 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them ; and he had none : they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging ; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter ; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. Our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it : which had he not done, he had not beene worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands than for the Presse,) I say, That a fleet of twentie ships, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse squadron ; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellows : of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruicable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselves scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall volicie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vnto one and the same beaten side. If the flecte of an hundred saile giue themselves any distance, then shall the lesser flecte preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hind-most, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellowes keepe the winde:

And if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole flecte must suffer shipwracke, or render it selfe. But such aduantage may be taken vpon a flecte of vnequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and forrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leus loquuntur, ingentes flugunt.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their aduantage of swift boats, & boarding the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthagi- ans, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success.

The Romans prepare to invade Africa: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

The victorie of Dulcius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great in-couragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicily, but all the other Iles betweene Italy and Africa, beginning with Sar- dinia, whither soone after they sent a flecte for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as cauled them in-campe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately bene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new flecte, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprife. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the port where Hannibal with his new flecte anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the flecte which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligece: for (as it hath bene said of old) Non est vis in bellis peritis, In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, * till Pa- normus was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vaine to draw the Cultra- uerant into a confusioe loci, quem Panormus nominant. In the other marke are found these words: Non est alius. Dux prae vno Drum, non Latin, potius pro, et conditio, &c. Unus Terris Panormus, et Sapin filius Abbas Abbas Abbas, fratris Latin filii, et found in the Castle Asch, in the year 1534. Now whether these inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men believe they were, I leaue every man to his owne fault. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth, when the Carthaginians who were Panormus, from whom the Romans (A. Aquila, and C. Cornilius, commanding this Armie) took it:

And when Mace had besieged Syracuse, it sent him in ayde 2000 Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans. For Cicero, sayeth Terris, namet among the free Cities of Sicily. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first Citie and Regall seat, as well of the Greeks and Syracusans in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople, of the Normans, French, and Armagians; which house it holdeth to this day, and is much frequented for the excellent wine which grows about it.

into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Towns, as Mythistratum, Etna, Camerina, Hippina, and others, between Panormus and Messina.

The year following, C. Attilius the Consul, vvhó commanded the Roman flecte, discouered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he vvas well beaten for the haste he made & lost all, saue the Gallie which transported him: vvherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Attilius his flecte was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theis; by which the vvhó remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, vvhich of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a flecte of three hundred and thirtie Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fiftie; vvhich, Quadragesima and Quinquagesima.

The Romans resolve to transport the vvarre into Africa, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, vvhich each of them filled their flecte, was perhaps the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fiftie thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to every Gallie, one with the other. The Roman flecte was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge of Triangle, the two first squadrons making the Flankes, and the third squadron, the Base:
the point thereof (vvherein vvere the two Consuls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well mannered, but exceeding thinn: so that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian flecte I cannot conceiue by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their flecte was thinn, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en hay, a long front of horse, and thinn: which Romans, face the Pistol preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Cartha- ginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the speed of the Romans) that, when the first flecte of the Romans halted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, & for eagerneesse of taking the Run-aways, leaue their own three squadrons far behinde them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed their horse boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilcar's direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinn front of the Carthaginian first flecte, which ran away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere vnto the body of the Carthaginian flecte; led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) receiued a great losse, vntill their second squadron came vp, vvhich forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian flecte, invaded the Roman Reareward, and preuailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Attilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Reare being relieved, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the A- frican; but the Consuls, ioyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victorie fell vnto the Romans, partly by the hardnesse of their Souldiers;
but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could neuer after ioyne himselfe vnto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of pre-uailling. So long as they fought vpon equal tearmes, and but squadron to squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman flecte vnengaged, and leadie to giue succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirtie that were slaine, and threescore and three that were taken.
